In case the assault with intent to kill is charged to have grown out of a neglect of duty, it is necessary to aver the ability to perform the duty [58]

Language of statute and statutory forms Subject to the general rules governing indictments and informations, it is ordinarily sufficient, as to both form and substance,[59] that indictments or informations for assault with intent to murder or kill follow the language of the statute defining the offense[60] without setting forth the particular circumstances [61] The offense may be pleaded in the exact terms of the statute,[62] but it is also sufficient to set it out substantially in the statutory language [63]

It is sufficient to follow literally forms prescribed by statute [64]

Name or description of offense A substantial compliance with an act requiring the statement of the name or a brief description of the offense is sufficient [65] Where the elements of the offense are all distinctly charged, the omission of descriptive words used in the statute in naming the offense is not fatal [66] Under a statute which does not name the offense, it need not be named provided its essential ingredients are set out [67]

Death of person assaulted It need not be alleged that the person assaulted did not die [68] An indictment which contains every essential element to be proved to establish the offense of murder except the death of the person assaulted within a year and a day may be sufficient to charge an assault with intent to murder [69] The effect of failure to allege that act of administering poison did not cause death is considered infra § 171

Included and collateral offenses It is not necessary to allege all the elements of minor offenses included in the offense charged,[70] although, where the statute punishes an assault with intent to murder when committed in the perpetration of, or attempt to perpetrate, particular crimes, it has been held that the indictment should set out with particularity the crime attempted,[71] but this is not essential when there is sufficient to show a complete offense, without considering the allegations as to the incidental offense [72] An indictment which sufficiently charges an offense under a particular statute is not vitiated by the fact that it contains expressions appropriate to a charge of a distinct offense, but which are insufficient to charge the latter offense [73] Under some statutes, however, an insufficient indictment drawn under one section of the statutes cannot be sustained as stating an offense denounced by another section [74]

§ 165. Time and Place of Offense

Except as the necessity may be obviated by statute, allegations of the place and time of the offense are essential

Except as a statute may provide otherwise, the date when the offense was committed must be alleged[75] and it is usual to allege the time as to each alleged fact,[76] however, it has been held sufficient to allege that the offense occurred on a certain day or thereabouts [77] The date of the offense once

"And before the finding of this indictment" need not be inserted after the words quoted in the text, in the properly alleged may be repeated by words of reference [78]

An averment of the place where the offense was committed is in general required only to be sufficiently definite to establish that the offense occurred within the jurisdiction of the court [79]

§ 166. Description of Person Assaulted

The person assaulted must be sufficiently described

The indictment or information charging an assault with intent to kill or murder must contain a clear and certain averment as to the person assaulted,[80] including an allegation of his name[81] or that it is unknown,[82] but its language is to be reasonably construed in determining its sufficiency for this purpose [83] A designation of the person's Christian name, middle initial, and surname is sufficient [84] It may be sufficient to employ the initials of the first name [85] Where the name has been once well stated, it has been held not necessary to repeat it in the charge of the specific intent to murder [86] It is better practice to describe a married woman by her Christian name rather than by the employment of her husband's name with the prefix "Mrs."[87] Where the name is several times correctly stated, a clerical error in one statement of it is not fatal [88] An indictment charging accused with assaulting with intent to murder several named persons is not bad on demurrer as duplicitous [89]

Where the name of the person assaulted is set out, the further fact that he is a human being need not be alleged,[90] especially where the indictment charges assault with intent to murder [91]

It need not be alleged that the person assaulted was "in the peace of the state"[92] The words "in the peace of the people," as applied to such person, means merely that he has done nothing to forfeit his right to live [93]

§ 167. Assault and Battery

a The assault
b The battery

a. The Assault

Except under statutes denouncing the doing of specific acts with intent to kill, an assault must be averred

Save in the case of indictments drawn under statutes punishing the doing of specific acts with intent to kill,[94] the indictment must either charge accused directly with having made an assault[95] or use such words as necessarily imply an assault [96] The failure to fill blanks in the date does not affect the sufficiency of the charge of the fact of assault [97]

Overt act An overt act in pursuance of the intent being an essential element of an assault with intent to kill and murder, as considered supra § 74, it is necessary that such overt act be alleged [98]

Assault on one's self An indictment which by a clerical error alleges an assault by the victim on himself is invalid on its face [99]

b The Battery

Only where a battery is an essential element of the crime is it necessary to allege a battery

Where a battery is not essential to the crime, no battery need be alleged,[1] but the inclusion of a absence of statute so requiring—State v O'Connor, supra charge of a battery as part of the offense does not vitiate the indictment [2] On the other hand, where a battery is an essential element of the crime, the indictment should allege a battery [3] A specific description of the assault and battery is not necessary,[4] unless required by statute [5] No particular form of words is required to charge a battery [6] In case the statute requires the assault to have been made with actual violence, such violence need not be charged in express terms, when the facts of the assault as set out imply it [7] Where the statute so defines the offense, the indictment must allege that the touching was unlawful and in either a rude, insolent, or angry manner,[8] although words equivalent in substance may be used [9]

§ 168. —— Manner and Means

a In general
b Description of weapon or instrument

a. In General

Except where the means employed or the manner in which they were used are described in the statute defining the offense, it is not ordinarily necessary to aver such manner and means

Under statutes describing assaults with intent to kill or murder in general terms, a particular averment of the means employed or the manner in which they were used is ordinarily regarded as unnecessary,[10] the gist of the offense being regarded as an assault with a felonious intent [11] Under this rule it is not generally necessary to state the weapon with which the assault was made,[12] but, where the statute defining the offense describes the manner and means which must be employed, they must be alleged so as to bring the offense within the statute,[13] and it has been held that an indictment under a statute punishing unlawful shooting at another, with intent to kill or wound, must state the instrument or weapon and show that it was sufficient for the purpose [14] According to some authorities, however, the facts constituting the assault must in any event be alleged,[15] and, where the assault is alleged to have been made with some particular instrumentality, the manner of its use should be described with sufficient particularity to inform accused of the nature of the assault which is charged [16] If the weapon is stated to be a firearm, it is not necessary to aver that it was loaded,[17] or capable of being fired,[18] pointed,[19] pointed at a vital part of the person assaulted,[20] or discharged,[21] or that the person was struck by the weapon or by a shot therefrom,[22] nor is it necessary to aver the manner in which the weapon was held[23] or used [24]

whom such intent is directed [63]

An allegation of intent to kill is also held sufficient to charge an intent to murder[64] and vice versa [65] Under a statute denouncing assault with intent to kill and murder, an indictment charging an assault with intent to kill has been held sufficient [66]

The intent to kill or murder must be stated in the body of the indictment,[67] although when once specifically stated it need not be repeated in the statement of the circumstances of the offense [68] The characterization of the intent of the assault need not be repeated in the specific averment of intent to kill and murder [69] The indictment may conclude with a charge of intent to kill and murder, although the statute defines the offense specifically as an assault with intent to kill,[70] or an assault with intent to murder [71]

A statutory intent may be averred by the use of equivalent expressions [72] An indictment for assault and battery with intent to kill, committed in perpetration of a felony, should charge the intent to commit a particular felony,[73] but it is not necessary to allege in terms that the intent was to commit a felony where the charge is of intent to murder [74] Under a statute making it necessary that the assault be committed on purpose and of malice aforethought, such elements must be charged in the indictment [75] Under a statute punishing assault with "attempt" to murder, a charge of assault with intent to murder is sufficient [76]

Attempt It is held, on the one hand, that a charge of an attempt to murder is not equivalent to a charge of intent to murder,[77] but, on the other, that a charge of an attempt to kill may be sufficient where the assault is well charged [78] Indictments or informations in prosecutions for an attempt to kill or murder are considered infra § 173

Connection of intent with assault It is not sufficient to charge accused with having a premeditated design and intent, without connecting such design and intent with the assault,[79] but language clearly showing such connection is sufficient [80]

Assault endangering life Under a statute punishing the making of an assault whereby the life of another is endangered, an express allegation of an intent to kill is unnecessary [81]

Degree of murder It is not ordinarily necessary to allege the intent to commit any particular degree of murder [82]

Intent to kill one of several assaulted There may be a charge of an assault on several with an intent to kill one [83]

b. Feloniousness

Where the statutory enumeration of the elements of the offense omits feloniousness, it need not be averred, it is otherwise generally necessary where the offense is made a felony

It would seem that the act need not be charged to have been done feloniously in an indictment for assault with intent to kill or murder at common law,[84] although there is authority to the contrary,[85] and

An indictment charging accused in the accusatory part with malicious shooting and wounding with intent to kill, and in the descriptive part alleging that accused unlawfully, willfully, feloniously, and maliciously shot at and wounded named person with a pistol, although death did not ensue, was not defective on ground of "variance" because of omission of words "with intent to kill" in descriptive part—McClain v Commonwealth, 144 S W 2d 816, 284 Ky 359—Smith v Commonwealth, 143 S W 2d 859, 284 Ky 80

a charge that the act was done with a felonious intent is not necessary under statutes which do not make the offense charged a felony.[86] However, where the offense is made by statute a felony, it is in general necessary to charge that the criminal act was feloniously done.[87] In a prosecution for assault with intent to murder where the intent to murder is charged to have been felonious, it is held not necessary to charge the assault to have been felonious,[88] and, where a felonious assault is charged, it has been held unnecessary to allege that it was with a felonious intent to kill,[89] although there is other authority holding it necessary to charge both the act and the assault as felonious.[90] A charge that accused feloniously made an assault with intent feloniously to kill is sufficient to charge a criminal assault with intent to commit a felony.[91] An allegation that an assault was made with malice aforethought with intent to kill is sufficient to charge assault with intent to commit murder.[92] The use of the word "felonious" is unnecessary in connection with a charge of a statutory offense in the words by which the statute creates and describes the offense.[93] So, where the statute provides merely that the act must be intentional and wrongful and must be committed with the intent to kill, it is not necessary to allege that the intent to kill was felonious.[94]

c. Malice

Averments of malice are not usually required, except under statutes making malice an ingredient of the offense.

The more general rule, particularly where conviction is not sought on grounds of malice aforethought,[95] is that it is sufficient to allege an intent to murder without averments of malice aforethought,[96] this rule being in some instances based on statutes rendering it sufficient that the indictment follow the language of the statute defining the offense,[97] and in others on the fact that malice is not an ingredient of the offense under the statutes defining it.[98] There are, however, cases to the effect that an indictment which fails to allege that the assault was with malice aforethought is fatally defective,[99] this being stated to be the common-law rule.[1] So, also, where malice is made a statutory ingredient of the offense, it must be averred,[2] according to some authorities, in the technical terms employed,[3] although others hold the use of equivalent words sufficient.[4]

Where the indictment is merely for an assault with intent to kill, the phrase "with malice aforethought" need not be used,[5] and while an indictment which fails to use the phrase "with malice aforethought" may be insufficient as an indictment for assault with intent to murder, it may be sufficient

as an indictment for assault with intent to kill, although allegations in the indictment tend to show the intention of the prosecution to frame an indictment for assault with intent to murder[6] Under a statute defining the crime of maliciously shooting with intent to kill, an averment of malice has been held essential[7]

An indictment from which the charge of malice is omitted may be sufficient to sustain a conviction of assault with intent to commit voluntary manslaughter[8] The unnecessary use of the words "malice aforethought" or "premeditated malice" will not invalidate the indictment[9]

Where such an allegation is required, it has been held that it should refer to the intent to kill as well as to the assault or battery[10] On the other hand, where an averment of malice aforethought is laid to the acts done, it has been held that it need not be repeated with regard to the intent,[11] or the allegation may be repeated by words of reference[12] Conversely, a proper allegation as to the intent need not be repeated as to the acts done[13]

d. Willfulness and Unlawfulness

Equivalent words may be used to show that the assault was willful, and also to show the unlawfulness of the act

At common law,[14] and under some statutes,[15] it is necessary to allege that the assault was willful, but it is sufficient if equivalent words are used[16] An allegation that the act was willfully done sufficiently charges a willful intent[17] Failure of the accusatory part of the indictment to allege that the act was willful may be cured by a showing in the descriptive part that the act was willful[18]

Where the indictment or information is required to charge that the act was done unlawfully, equivalent words are sufficient[19] Accordingly, it is sufficient to charge that the act was done with malice or with malice aforethought[20]

§ 171. —— Grade or Degree of Offense Had Death Ensued

It is not usually necessary to aver that had death ensued the assault would have constituted murder, nor to aver the particular degree of murder that would have resulted

It is not usually regarded as essential that it be averred that, if death had ensued, the assault would have constituted murder[21] In at least one jurisdiction, however, such averments are necessary[22]

Ordinarily, where murder is divided by statute into degrees, the matter showing the degree need not be averred,[23] but there is authority to the contrary[24] An indictment insufficient to charge a higher degree may be sustained as for a lower degree[25]

Under Florida statute against assaults with intent to commit felonies providing a greater punishment in the case of assault with an intent to commit a felony punishable with death or imprisonment for life than if the felony intended was not so punishable, the indictment in the case of an assault with intent to commit murder need not state the degree of murder, as the punishment is the same if the intent was to commit murder either in the first or second degree—Thomas v State, 95 So 752, 85 Fla 113—30 C J p 125 note 2 [b]

sued, would have constituted murder or manslaughter.[26]

Administering poison It is unnecessary to use the word "murder" in charging the offense of administering poison with intent to kill, but if used such word will not change the offense to that of assault to commit murder where the accusatory pleading otherwise charges the offense of administering poison with intent to kill An information charging the offense of administering poison with intent to kill is not open to the claim that it charges assault with intent to kill because of failure to allege that the act of administering the poison did not cause death, the very statement that the poison was administered with the intent to kill necessarily implying that death was not caused by the act[27]

§ 172. Present Ability to Execute Intent

Present ability of accused to execute the intent charged need not, usually, be alleged

Irrespective of whether the ability to carry out the intention is essential to accused's criminal liability, as considered supra § 76, the ability to do so need not, in most jurisdictions, be alleged[28] So when the assault is charged to have been committed with a firearm, it is not necessary to charge that accused was within range,[29] although it has been intimated that such an averment, while not required to sustain a conviction of simple assault, might be necessary to sustain a conviction of felonious assault[30]

Assault and battery with intent An indictment charging an assault and battery with intent to kill need not allege a present ability to commit the injury,[31] but such an averment is essential to an indictment merely charging an assault with intent to kill and murder,[32] and in its absence the indictment can be construed only as an attempt to charge an assault and battery with intent to murder[33]

It is unnecessary to describe accused's ability,[34] but an attempt to do so does not render the indictment defective[35]

C ATTEMPT, THREAT, OR SOLICITATION TO KILL

§ 173. Attempt or Solicitation

a Attempt
b Solicitation

a. Attempt

Acts constituting the attempt must, usually, be alleged in prosecution for attempt to kill or murder

The general rule is that an indictment for an attempt to kill and murder must allege some act done by accused of such nature as to constitute an attempt in a legal sense to commit the contemplated offense,[36] but need not set forth the special circumstances of the attempt[37] A statement of the offense in compliance with the statute defining it has been held sufficient, notwithstanding the omission of allegations of fact showing the overt or other acts constituting the attempt, particularly in the absence of demurrer by accused[38] It has been held that the indictment need not aver in express terms that the acts done in the attempt to kill were done with intent to murder,[39] but the better practice is to charge both the intent and the overt act,[40] and it has been held that malice aforethought should be alleged to show that if death had ensued the crime would have been murder [41]

The degree of the murder attempted need not be specified [42]

An indictment for an attempt to poison need not allege accused's knowledge of the deadly character of the substance used,[43] or that the quantity was sufficient to kill,[44] but it must allege that the substance administered was a poison [45]

In case the offense is defined by statute, language equivalent to that employed in the statute may be used in the description of the offense [46]

In a prosecution for an attempt to murder by shooting, it is not necessary to allege that the victim was seen, or could be seen, by accused, or that the victim was in such position that he could be hit by a bullet at the time of the shooting [47]

b. Solicitation

In prosecutions for solicitation, facts and circumstances constituting the offense must be alleged

In prosecutions for soliciting another to kill or murder, facts and circumstances constituting the offense charged must be alleged [48]

§ 174. Threat

The elements of the offense of threatening to take the life of another must be set out in the indictment or information.

Under statutes defining the offense of threatening to take the life of another, it is necessary that the indictment or information set out clearly the elements essential to the crime,[49] but it is sufficient if it substantially follows the statutory language,[50] and it is not necessary to negative facts which by a separate section of the statute would prevent the act from being criminal [51] It is not necessary to set out the language in which the threat was expressed,[52] nor is it necessary to allege that the person whose life was threatened was a "human being," notwithstanding the statute defining the offense employs such words [53]

Threats against president Under a statute defining the offense of threatening to take the life of the president of the United States, the indictment should state the offense in such a manner as fully to inform accused of the nature of the charge,[54] and must set forth the facts so distinctly as to enable him to prepare his defense,[55] and so particularly as to enable him to plead a former conviction or acquittal if again indicted for the same offense [56] It is not necessary that the indictment state in whose presence the threat was made,[57] although the

D. ISSUES, PROOF, AND VARIANCE

§ 175. In General

On a plea of not guilty every material allegation of the indictment or information is in issue and must be proved, and under such plea accused may avail himself of any defense not required by law to be specially pleaded

Accused's plea of not guilty puts in issue every material allegation of the indictment or information,[59] and under this plea accused may avail himself of any defense not required by law to be specially pleaded.[60]

The fact that the prosecution introduces evidence of an intent and motive of committing another felony does not confine the charge to one of murder in the perpetration of such a felony, where the terms of the indictment are general.[61]

Matters to be proved The material allegations of the indictment or information must be proved;[62] but failure to establish matter which is unnecessary to the description of the offense is not as a general rule fatal.[63] Where there are two or more counts, it is not necessary that each of the counts be supported by evidence warranting a conviction.[64]

Evidence admissible under pleadings As in other criminal prosecutions, the evidence must be confined to the issues,[65] although a specific allegation

as to every circumstance relating to the crime is not essential to the admission of evidence relating thereto.[66] Declarations made as a part of the res gestæ are admissible although they tend to show malice not charged in the indictment.[67]

Variance between allegations and proof A disagreement between the averments of the indictment or information and the proof in some matter which is legally essential to the charge constitutes a variance,[68] and as a general rule a variance in a material matter is fatal.[69] Under the modern practice a variance is not material unless it misleads accused in making his defense or may expose him to the danger of being again put in jeopardy for the same offense.[70]

§ 176. Proof of Distinct Offense

Proof of an offense different from that charged usually constitutes a fatal variance

Proof of an offense different from that charged ordinarily constitutes a fatal variance,[71] but in case the same act constitutes two offenses it is immaterial that on a charge of one offense the proof incidentally discloses the other.[72] Proof of successive acts, so connected as to be part of one transaction, is not objectionable as showing more than one offense.[73] On a charge of voluntary manslaughter, under some statutes, accused cannot be convicted on proof of involuntary manslaughter.[74] Where it is charged that deceased was killed in an assault on a third person with intent to murder such person, evidence is admissible of the character of the assault on the third person.[75] Where two or more are jointly indicted for murder, and it appears that one of them inflicted the mortal wound, there can be no conviction as to the others based on an assault independent of that which caused the death.[76]

§ 177. Nature or Degree of Offense

General rules governing issues, proof, and variance apply with respect to the nature or degree of the offense.

An indictment for murder in the first degree will sustain a conviction of a lesser degree of homicide,[77] and it has been held that an accused on trial

Conviction of lesser degree of homicide than warranted by evidence as nonprejudicial error see infra § 428

Failure to prove an allegation essential to the description of a higher degree will not invalidate a convic-

for murder in the second degree is not entitled to an acquittal because the evidence against him would sustain a conviction for murder in the first degree;[78] but it has also been held that, where the evidence discloses a higher grade or degree of crime than that charged,[79] or an offense not necessarily included within the terms of the allegations of the indictment or information,[80] then a fatal variance exists. In most jurisdictions an indictment in the ordinary form for murder in the first degree is sufficient to admit proof that the crime was committed in the perpetration or attempt to perpetrate a felony, thus bringing the killing within the statutory definition of murder in the first degree.[81] So an indictment good at common law which does not specify the degree will sustain a conviction of murder in any degree defined by the statute under which accused is prosecuted,[82] and the people may prove any case which amounts to murder under the statute,[83] and a conviction of murder in the first degree may be had in any case where the offense proved is brought within either of the statutory definitions of that degree.[84] So also, under an indictment or information charging murder perpetrated with a premeditated design to effect death under a statutory definition of murder, accused may be convicted of murder as defined by any of the subdivisions of the statute.[85] Proof that the killing was done after lying in wait is admissible, although not charged.[86] Under some statutes a common-law indictment for murder will not sustain a conviction of murder in the first degree.[87] Some authorities hold, morever, that, on a charge of a specific kind of murder as defined by statute, there can be no conviction on proof of another specific kind,[88] although admitting proof of the felony or attempt to perpetrate a felony under a general charge when proof of deliberation and premeditation has been received.[89] If the indictment unnecessarily charges that the killing was committed in the perpetration of a felony, and there is no evidence indicating that it was committed in such perpetration, proof that the killing was willful, deliberate, and premeditated is at variance with the allegation.[90]

§ 178. Time and Place

a. Time
b. Place

a. Time

As a general rule a variance as to the time of the offense or the date of death is immaterial

As a general rule a variance as to the time of the offense is immaterial in case it is shown to have occurred prior to the finding of the indictment and within the period prescribed by the statutes of limitations,[91] in some jurisdictions this rule being stat-

tion of a lower degree—Pyke v State, 36 So 577, 47 Fla 93—30 C J p 128 note 63

78. Not material variance

Where a conviction of murder in the second degree is set aside, and the evidence on the second trial for murder in the second degree establishes murder on express malice and murder in the first degree, such proof does not constitute a variance, entitling accused to an acquittal, but he may be convicted of murder in the second degree—Woodard v State, 111 S W 941, 54 Tex Cr 86

utory[92] So, where death has been alleged to be instantaneous,[93] or on a day certain,[94] proof that the death occurred on a later date does not constitute a material variance

b. Place

Ordinarily the state must prove the venue Except so far as to show jurisdiction, however, the averments as to the place of the offense need not as a rule be proved In some jurisdictions proof that death occurred in a county other than that alleged is not a fatal variance

In the absence of contrary statute, the state must prove the venue[95] even if it is not formally alleged in the indictment[96] It is sufficient, however, to prove that the offense was committed in a place which the court judicially knows to be within the county,[97] and it is not necessary for the state to locate the exact spot where the homicide was committed,[98] it being sufficient to show that it was committed in the vicinity of the place charged, which was in the county in which the charge was laid[99] Except so far as to show jurisdiction, the averments as to place of the offense need not as a rule be proved[1] It has been held, however, that a conviction cannot be sustained on proof of homicide committed in a county other than that alleged in the indictment,[2] and that the place of the mortal stroke alleged must be proved, although death occurred in another county, in which the prosecution is brought,[3] but where the offense may be prosecuted either in the county in which the injury was inflicted or that in which death resulted,[4] or where it is required to be prosecuted in the county[5] or district[6] in which the injury was inflicted, it may be shown that death occurred in a county other than that alleged, or even in another state,[7] and, where the indictment alleges that the offense charged was committed in one county, it may be shown that the wounding took place in another county[8]

§ 179. Description of Person Killed or Assaulted

It is necessary to prove that the person assaulted or killed was the one named in the indictment, and a material variance in this respect is fatal, under some decisions the question is treated as one of identity and if the proof identifies the victim as being the person described in the indictment it is sufficient

The person killed or assaulted must be proved to be the person named in the indictment[9] The name of the person killed or assaulted must generally be proved as alleged,[10] and so must an allegation that the name is unknown to the grand jury[11] Formerly there was a strict application of this rule, and even slight variances, if the names were not idem sonans, were held fatal[12] The modern rule is that it is a question of identity,[13] and where the identity of the person in the evidence with the one named in the indictment is established,[14] as where there is direct testimony to that effect,[15] or where the inaccuracy is not misleading,[16] the variance is not fatal It is sufficient to show that deceased was generally known by the name stated in the indictment,[17] or that he was known by that name as well as another,[18] or that accused knew him by the name alleged,[19] and, under such circumstances, it is immaterial that the true name is not stated even under an alias[20]

Some statutes make an erroneous allegation as to the person injured immaterial if the act charged is sufficiently identified[21] or if the error does not prejudice accused's rights[22] The variance between an abbreviation, diminutive, or nickname and the full name is not material where it does not cast any doubt on the identity of the person[23] A failure to prove the complete name of the victim is not necessarily fatal,[24] and a mistake in the middle initial is not fatal,[25] even where there is shown to be another person of the name stated in the indictment, provided accused is not misled[26] Where the jury were justified in treating the name in the indictment and the name proved as the same, a conviction will not be set aside on the ground of variance[27]

A substantial agreement of the evidence with the charge as to the description of deceased, whose name is alleged to be unknown, is sufficient[28]

Unnecessary matters of description Averments descriptive of the person killed, although unnecessarily made, must be proved as alleged,[29] but it is sufficient if there is substantial proof of identity [30] However, since it is not necessary to allege that a named decedent was a human being, proof of such fact is not required [31]

Separate counts. Where deceased is designated by different names in different counts, one count may be dismissed and conviction had on the other.[32]

Peace officer. It is not necessary to aver that the person killed was a peace officer acting in the discharge of his duty in order that proof of such fact be admissible [33]

§ 180. Indictments against Several and for Killing and Assaults on Several

A charge of killing two persons may be supported by proof of the killing of one. Where two persons are jointly indicted, one may be convicted and the other acquitted, and evidence may be admitted to show conspiracy without a formal charge of conspiracy

A charge of killing two persons may be supported by proof of the killing of one [34] So, on a charge of assault against several, it is not a fatal variance that the proof establishes that only one person was assaulted [35] In case an assault is charged with intent to murder two persons, it may be shown that it was by different acts, although in the same transaction [36]

Where two or more are jointly indicted for homicide or assault, it is not a variance fatal to the conviction of one that the guilt of one or more of the others is not established,[37] or that one or more of the others are found guilty of the crime but in a lesser degree [38] A charge that accused jointly with others killed deceased may be supported by proof that accused acted alone or in concert [39]

An indictment charging two or more persons jointly with murder necessarily involves conspiracy, and proof of the latter may be admitted without its being formally charged [40] That one count charges conspiracy to commit the murder does not prevent conviction under another count without proof of the conspiracy [41]

§ 181. Liability as Principal, Abettor, or Accessary

Where no distinction in punishment is made, one charged as a principal may be convicted on proof that he was an abettor, or vice versa, and, where the distinction between principals and accessaries before the fact is abolished, one charged as a principal may be convicted as an accessary before the fact, or vice versa.

cused alleged to have been present aiding and abetting may be convicted on proof that he was the principal,[43] the variance as to the particular part taken by accused being considered immaterial[44] So, where the distinction between principals and accessaries before the fact is not recognized, an accessary before the fact may be indicted and tried as a principal in the first degree,[45] and, conversely, one charged as an accessary before the fact may be convicted although he was present at the killing[46] Where the distinction is retained, however, one indicted as a principal cannot be convicted as an accessary before the fact,[47] or as an accessary after the fact,[48] nor can a principal be convicted under an indictment charging that he is an accessary[49] Where it is not known to the grand jury which of two persons accused acted as principal and which as accessary, a statement of that fact in the indictment is sufficient on which to convict either as principal[50] So also one count may charge the perpetration of the act by a certain person, aided and abetted by accused, and another its perpetration by an unknown person so aided and abetted, and a conviction may be sustained on either theory[51] An information charging accused as an accessary after the fact to a murder by unknown persons is not at variance with proof that a designated person committed the murder[52] One charged as an accessary before the fact to murder may be convicted of being an accessary before the fact to manslaughter[53]

was committed are alleged, the proof must correspond with the allegation, although substantial correspondence is sufficient

In case the indictment or information sets out the manner or means by which the assault or homicide was committed, the proof must correspond with such allegations,[57] although substantial correspondence is sufficient[58] A variance in this respect will not be fatal if it is of such a nature that accused cannot be misled,[59] or if the nature of the violence and kind of death inflicted by it are the same[60] In case the indictment charges the use of several means, the state may prove any or all of the means stated,[61] unless it charges death to have been caused by cooperating causes, in which case there can be no conviction on evidence that it was caused by one of them singly[62] If the indictment charges both known and unknown means, the state may prove any or all of the means stated or may prove that the means were unknown,[63] and if the indictment describes the instrument used in general terms, as a club, blunt instrument, or heavy missile, and further states that a more particular description is unknown, any instrument corresponding to the general description may be proved[64] When it is not required to allege that an assault with intent to kill was committed with a deadly weapon, such fact need not be shown by direct proof on the trial,[65] but it has also been held that, when it is charged in an indictment for assault with intent to murder that the assault was made with a weapon likely to produce death, the character of the weapon enters into the description of the offense and must be proved the same as any other essential feature[66] In a jurisdiction where an indictment for assault with intent to kill must allege the means used where the injury is other than by shooting, stabbing, cutting, or wounding, such other means cannot be proved unless alleged[67] Under a statute providing that the manner of killing is not material except to show the disposition of mind or intent with which the act was committed, where the conviction was of involuntary manslaughter, in which no intent to take life is involved, a variance between the man-

Test as to variance

In homicide cases the test as to whether there is a material variance between the proof and the allegations in the indictment as to the manner and means of death depends entirely on whether the instrument used to cause death and the manner of death are substantially of the same nature and character as alleged in the indictment—Dean v State, 125 A 478, 2 W W Harr Del, 469, affirming State v. (1) Where the indictment alleged the use of knucks, black-jack, or club" and stated that a further description of the instrument was unknown, proof that the blow was struck with a pistol used as a club or black-jack did not create a material variance—Barton v Commonwealth, 38 S W 2d 218 238 Ky 356

ner and means alleged and proved is immaterial.[68] Where the allegation is that accused directly inflicted the fatal wound, and the proof shows that it was produced by some independent agency, there is a fatal variance[69]

c. Particular Weapon or Instrument

While the proof as to the instrument with which a homicide was committed must not be essentially different from that alleged in the indictment, ordinarily the state is not held to strict proof of the instrument alleged.

While the proof as to the instrument with which an assault or homicide was committed must not be essentially different from that alleged in the indictment,[70] the state generally is not held to strict proof of the instrument or weapon alleged[71] Thus a variance between the allegation and the proof is immaterial where the instruments are of the same variety and inflict the same kind of wound,[72] for example, when the murder is alleged to have been committed with a particular sort of firearm, proof establishing another sort is not a material variance[73] The same rule applies to instruments of striking,[74] but an indictment charging death from a blow with a particular instrument is not supported by proof that death resulted from a fall after the blow[75] If the particular poison administered in the commission of a homicide is unnecessarily stated, the proof need not correspond with the allegation[76] Where there is evidence to sustain the charge as to the instrument used, it is not fatal that such evidence is disputed[77] or that the jury might not find in accordance with it[78] Evidence of the use of instruments other than those alleged may be admitted, when competent, on the issues of the case generally, although not on that particular issue[79]

d. Manner or Means Unknown

Where the character of the weapon used is alleged to be unknown to the grand jury, the state may prove any weapon, but if the proof shows that the means of the killing were known to the grand jury there is a material variance

Where an indictment alleges only that the killing was done with an instrument unknown to the grand jury, and the proof shows that the means of the killing were known to the grand jury, there is a material variance[80] Where it is alleged that the character of the weapon used is unknown, it is held that the state should prove that fact,[81] and also that

Knowledge of grand jury not shown

The fact that an indictment of an accessary to a murder stated that deceased was choked to death by the principal does not render invalid an indictment, returned the following day charging the principal with the killing by means and manner to the grand jurors unknown—Sanchez v. State, 78 S W 504, 46 Tex Cr 179

the grand jury could not have learned its character by reasonable diligence[82] On the other hand, it has been held that the allegation need not be proved in the first instance by the people,[83] that a conviction may be sustained on a count charging the means as unknown where the killing is established but there is no evidence of the particular means used,[84] that, in order to show a variance, the knowledge of the grand jurors must be clearly shown,[85] and that a variance is not shown by the fact that such means could have been ascertained by the grand jury with reasonable diligence[86] or the fact that they are made known to the petit jury[87] Where the indictment alleges that the character of the weapon used is unknown, the state may prove any weapon[88]

e. Manner of Using Weapon or Instrument

Where an indictment charges an assault or killing with a named weapon, without specifying the manner of its use, any manner consistent with the use of such weapon may be proved Where the manner of its use is stated, a substantial conformity of the proof thereto is sufficient

Where the indictment charges simply an assault or killing with a named weapon, without specifying the manner of its use, any manner not inconsistent with the use of such weapon may be proved[89] Where the manner of using the weapon is stated, a substantial conformity of the proof thereto is sufficient[90] Where it is alleged that the weapon was held in the hands or in either hand, this need not be proved[91] A fortiori a substantial correspondence between the allegations and proof in this particular is sufficient[92] Where, however, the manner of using the weapon is stated, proof of its use in an entirely different manner will not sustain a conviction[93] The particular manner in which poison was administered need not be proved as laid[94]

§ 183. Wound or Injury

A variance between an allegation describing the mortal wound and the proof is not fatal if there is a substantial agreement

In determining the scope of the issues as to the nature of the wound or injury, the indictment is to be construed in its ordinary rather than its technical sense[95] Although formerly at common law it was required to describe the mortal wound with particularity, as discussed supra § 151, it was held that if, on evidence, the wound of which the person died appeared to be of another kind the indictment would be sustained[96] So under modern decisions, in case a particular statement is given, it need not

"Wound"

In a prosecution for murder under an indictment charging that deceased received a mortal wound on the left side of the head from the hands of accused from which he instantly died, and it appeared that accused hit deceased with a brick fracturing his skull, there was no variance between the indictment and proof, the word "wounds" in medicine meaning injuries of every description that affect the hard or soft parts of the body, and comprehending bruises, contusions, fractures, luxations, etc, and in law the word means any lesion of the body, the correct definition of a "lesion" being a hurt, loss, or injury —People v Durand, 139 N E 78, 307 Ill 611

96. Mo—State v Edmundson, 64 Mo 398

be proved as laid,[97] and a variance between an allegation descriptive of the wound and the proof is not fatal if there is a substantial agreement[98] Thus a variance as to the description of the size and shape of the wound,[99] or as to the part of the body upon which it was located,[1] is immaterial if the wound is of the same character Likewise it is immaterial that the indictment charges but one wound to have been inflicted, and proof shows several,[2] any one of which might have been mortal[3] Where the indictment contains no description of the wounds, such fact does not render the evidence with regard thereto inadmissible[4]

Where there is evidence to sustain the allegations that the homicide resulted from the particular wounds or injuries averred, it is not a material variance that there is also evidence showing other factors, such as an operation or an illness or a particular bodily condition, which contributed to cause the death[5]

§ 184. Intent

An indictment for murder charging that accused intentionally killed deceased is supported by proof that the intention was to kill a third person In a prosecution for assault with intent to murder, the specific intent must in general be proved as charged

An indictment for murder charging that accused wilfully and intentionally killed deceased is supported by proof that accused did an act with intent to kill a third person which resulted in the death of deceased,[6] or by proof of a general intent to kill[7] So, where the indictment charges the killing to have been committed with a premeditated design to effect the death of some person other than the one killed, it is not a fatal variance to prove that the premeditated design was to effect the death of the person killed,[8] and the converse of this proposition has also been held to be true[9]

Specific intent being of the gist of the offense of assault with intent to murder, as discussed supra § 79, it must in general be proved as charged,[10] and an indictment charging an intent to kill a person named cannot be supported by proof of intent to kill another,[11] or by proof that accused evinced a depraved heart, regardless of human life, if without a premeditated design to kill the particular person,[12] although the sufficiency generally of proof of intent to kill one to sustain an allegation of intent to kill another has been maintained[13]

Since there may be a conviction of an included offense, on failure of proof of the specific intent to kill, accused is not entitled to an acquittal if such intent is not proved[14] Where the motive or intent is not required to be stated and is not stated, it may nevertheless be proved as tending to establish the commission of the crime[15] In a prosecution for murder in the first degree, accused may introduce any relevant and proper evidence of a lack of premeditated design in the admitted killing so as to reduce the offense to a lower degree[16]

Where one is charged as an accomplice with having encouraged the principal to kill the person named, evidence that he encouraged him to kill another person is inadmissible,[17] although it has been

A PRESUMPTIONS AND BURDEN OF PROOF

§ 185. In General

The prosecution has the burden throughout the trial of proving all of the essential elements of the offense and of establishing the guilt of the accused

The general rules of evidence respecting the burden of proof apply to prosecutions for homicide[19] The prosecution has the burden throughout the trial[20] of proving all of the essential elements of the crime charged,[21] and of establishing the guilt of accused[22] This burden is never discharged before a consideration of the whole evidence, including evidence offered by accused as to self-defense[23]

In accordance with the general rule in criminal prosecutions, stated in Criminal Law § 570, the state must prove the venue even if not formally alleged in the indictment[24]

Where the admissibility of evidence depends on the showing of other facts, as stated in Criminal Law § 578, the burden is on the party offering the evidence in question to prove such preliminary matters[25]

§ 186. Corpus Delicti

The prosecution has the burden of proof as to the corpus delicti, and in general no presumptions as to the fact of death may be indulged in against the accused, although as to the cause of death and the character of the killing certain presumptions may arise from the attendant circumstances

The burden is on the prosecution to prove the corpus delicti,[26] that is, the fact of the victim's

Culpable negligence
In a prosecution under a statute punishing the killing of a human being by another's culpable negligence as manslaughter when the killing is not justifiable or excusable homicide or murder, the burden of proving culpable negligence rests on the state —Russ v State, 191 So 296, 140 Fla 217

Identity of deceased
In prosecution for murder, where a small portion of a human body weighing between fifteen and twenty pounds was found in burned automobile, and the state sought to prove that the remains were of the person allegedly murdered by accused, burden was on state to prove such fact —O'Keefe v State, Tex Cr , 167 S W 2d 1035

Time and place
(1) In a murder prosecution, the state must prove the time and place of the assault and death —State v Rector, 155 S E 385, 158 S C 212

Inferences

(2) However, deceased's sudden death does not warrant inference that his death was result of criminal act and, unless it is proved that death was the result of criminal act, presumption exists that it resulted from natural causes.—Treppish v. State, 252 N.W. 388, 126 Neb. 21.

Participation in, or connection with, criminal act

(1) The state must show that accused was connected with, or participated in, the act that caused the death.—State v. Benham, 118 P.2d 91, 58 Ariz. 129.

(2) In prosecution for murder, burden was on the state to prove that deceased person met his death by the criminal act of another and that accused was present and assisted in the act or that she was performing some part in connection with it in a manner that would make her a principal in the crime.—O'Keefe v. State, Tex.Cr., 167 S.W.2d 1035.

(3) In a prosecution of one jointly indicted with another for murder in the first degree, the burden was on the state to prove that accused was particeps criminis in the killing.—Cranford v. State, 245 S.W. 189, 156 Ark. 39.

(4) In a prosecution for murder in the first degree, the burden is on the people to establish that accused was a principal in the killing.—People v. Sobieskoda, 139 N.E. 558, 235 N.Y. 411.

An act resulting mediately or immediately in death must be shown by the prosecution.—People v. Freeman, 60 P.2d 333, 16 Cal.App.2d 101.

Aiding and abetting

(1) In a prosecution for murder, the burden was on the commonwealth to prove that accused actually fired the shots, or aided and abetted others in doing the shooting.—Tester v. Commonwealth, 160 S.E. 62, 157 Va. 826.

(2) In a trial for murder of one concededly killed by accused's minor son, burden was on commonwealth to prove that accused was not only present when killing occurred, but was aiding and abetting son in the commission of the crime, by the performance of some overt act.—Hamilton v. Commonwealth, 15 S.E.2d 94, 177 Va. 896.

Administration of poison

(1) In a prosecution for murder by the use of strychnine, the state had the burden of proving that accused administered strychnine to deceased.—Osbon v. State, 13 N.E.2d 223, 213 Ind. 413.

(2) In a prosecution for involuntary manslaughter the burden was on state to prove that accused mixed morphine with coffee which caused death, or knew thereof.—State v. Korth, 217 N.W. 236, 204 Iowa 1360.

(3) The state had the burden of establishing that accused, charged with attempt to poison, gave poison to injured party on occasion in question notwithstanding state established motive.—Pullen v. State, 46 S.W.2d 1004, 120 Tex.Cr. 42.

Negativing manner of death

(1) The mere possibility that deceased received his fatal wound in some manner other than at the hands of accused need not be negatived by the state.—State v. Aiken, 1 S.E.2d 821, 215 N.C. 317.

(2) The prosecution need not prove that no one else fired the fatal shots.—People v. Spaulding, 141 N.E. 196, 309 Ill. 292.

to show whether it was natural, accidental, or felonious [30] On prima facie proof of the death of the person alleged to have been killed, the burden rests on accused to show that such person is still alive [31]

When a wound from which death might ensue has been inflicted with murderous intent and has been followed by death, the burden of proof is on accused to show that death did not result from such wound, but from some other cause [32]

Presumptions As to the fact of the victim's death no presumptions can be assumed against accused, but every presumption is in his favor [33] In the absence of inculpatory evidence there is a presumption that death was not caused by the criminal act of accused,[34] but there is no presumption that it was caused in any particular way, whether by suicide, by accused himself through innocent misadventure, or by the act of someone else undetected or unknown [35] However, the killing, when proved, is presumed to be felonious or unlawful until the contrary appears [36]

Evidence showing that accused's act was sufficient to cause death raises a rebuttable presumption that death was due to such act,[37] and death may be presumed to have been caused by apparent wounds, particularly where there is no suggestion in the record that deceased died from any other cause [38] While the law presumes accused innocent, there is also a strong presumption against suicide [39]

The possession of decedent's property by one not having rightful custody shortly after decedent's murder and robbery creates presumption that the possessor committed the murder.[40]

§ 187. Intent

Presumptions and burden of proof as to questions with reference to intent are treated specifically in the following sections, the specific question of intent to kill being discussed infra § 188, and questions with reference to assault with intent to kill infra § 189 and with reference to manslaughter infra § 190

§ 188. —— Specific Intent to Kill

The burden of proving a specific intent to kill is on the prosecution, although it may be inferred from the circumstances of the killing

The burden of proving an intent to kill on the part of accused is on the prosecution[41] except where it is not an essential element of the offense charged,[42] however, under the general rule that the law presumes that a person intends the natural, necessary, and probable consequences of his acts,[43]

Presumption of fact

derous weapon or has otherwise been of such nature that its probable and natural result would be to produce death,[49] and the manner of use even of a deadly weapon must always be considered.[50] It has been held that, where the mere fact of killing is shown and nothing more, the presumption is that the killing was intentional,[51] and there are statutes which are given that effect.[52] Where one human being kills another, it is not to be presumed, without evidence, that he committed the act unconsciously, accidentally, or while insane.[53]

Rebuttal of presumption The presumption of intent arising from proof of the killing[54] or from the use of a deadly weapon[55] is not conclusive, and it may be rebutted by evidence of other facts and circumstances,[56] and it has been held that, where there is direct evidence of eyewitnesses raising an issue as to the intent, there is no room for the application of the presumption arising from the use of a deadly weapon.[57]

§ 189. —— Assault with Intent to Kill

The burden is on the prosecution to establish the specific intent to take life.

In a prosecution for assault with intent to kill or murder, the prosecution must establish the specific intent to take life.[58] Such an intent may be presumed or inferred from the character of the as-

(2) The presumption is not one of law but one of fact —Commonwealth v Kluska, 3 A 2d 398, 333 Pa 65

(3) The presumption arises from common knowledge that such use is likely to cause death —Commonwealth v Kluska, supra

Manner reasonably certain to produce death

Where an assault is made in a manner that is reasonably certain to produce death and which actually does cause death, the only rational presumption to be drawn therefrom is that the assailant intended to take life of person assailed —People v Patubo, 71 P 2d 270, 9 Cal 2d 537, 113 A L R 1303—People v Fleming, 23 P 2d 28, 218 Cal 300

Shooting into a crowd

(1) One who shoots recklessly into a crowd in utter disregard of human life is presumed to intend to kill any or all of crowd —White v State, 153 So 387, 169 Miss 332

In Pennsylvania

(1) A presumption of intent to kill arising from use of a deadly weapon on a vital part of another's body may be overcome by assailant's denial of such intent or by any other appropriate evidence -Commonwealth v Kluska, 3 A 2d 398, 333 Pa 65

sault, the use of a deadly weapon, and other attendant circumstances, as appears supra § 79 However, the presumption of intent arising from the use of a deadly weapon is not conclusive,[59] unless the shooting is neither in self-defense nor under circumstances of justification[60]

In a prosecution for shooting with intent to kill, a presumption of law as to intent does not take the place of testimony of witnesses who were present and testified to details of shooting and attendant circumstances[61]

§ 190. —— Manslaughter

Although the prosecution has the burden of proof of the requisite criminal intent in a prosecution for manslaughter, it may be inferred from the circumstances

In a prosecution for manslaughter, the state has the burden of proving that the homicide was willful[62]

Under a statute prohibiting an intentional pointing of firearms at another, and providing that if death results from the discharge of such weapon the person pointing the same shall be guilty of manslaughter, the prosecution must prove affirmatively that the pointing was intentional[63]

In a prosecution for involuntary manslaughter, where there is a clear violation of the law leading necessarily to the fatal result, the law will infer the criminal intent[64]

§ 191. Malice

The burden of proof of malice is on the prosecution.

On a trial for murder, the burden of proving malice is on the prosecution,[65] and never shifts to accused[66]

Presumptions and inferences as to malice in prosecutions for murder are considered supra §§ 22–26, and in prosecutions for assault with intent to kill, supra § 78 The presumption of continuance of malice is considered supra § 27, and the burden of overcoming an inference of malice, supra § 28

When the question is as to whether or not accused, charged with intent to murder or with murder, acted on antecedent malice or fresh provocation, the law will presume that his action was on fresh provocation, unless there is evidence tending to connect the antecedent malice with the fresh provocation[67]

§ 192. Deliberation and Premeditation

The burden of establishing deliberation and premeditation is on the prosecution, although they may be inferred from the circumstances of the killing

The burden is on the prosecution to establish deliberation and premeditation,[68] or premeditated design to kill,[69] under statutes making such elements essential to the crime of murder or of murder in a particular degree, as discussed supra §§ 15, 30

The fact that killing is malicious in law does not necessarily imply the presence of willfulness, deliberation, with a deadly weapon,[71] does not raise a presumption of premeditation or deliberation, so as to make the offense murder in the first degree under statutes dividing murder into degrees However, the premeditation or deliberation which is essential for this purpose may be inferred from the facts and circumstances of the killing.[72]

Where a homicide is committed in the perpetration of a felony deliberation and premeditated design are presumed [73]

The law presumes a homicide occurred because of an old grudge clearly proved, unless a new and sufficient provocation is shown, in which case the killing is presumed to have occurred on the new provocation.[74]

§ 193. Matters of Defense

In general it rests on accused to establish matters of justification, excuse, or mitigation where not shown by the evidence adduced against him, although the burden of proving an unlawful killing by accused rests on the prosecution throughout the trial.

The general rule, expressly stated by statute in some jurisdictions, is that, the fact of killing being first proved or admitted, any circumstances in mitigation or excuse or justification thereof are to be shown by accused,[75] unless they arise out of the

The burden of proof rests on accused to establish any distinct affirmative matter of defense which is wholly disconnected from the body of the offense charged,[79] and the same is true as to defensive facts which are peculiarly within the knowledge of accused[80]

The burden is always on the state to rebut exculpatory evidence contained in its own case[81]

Where no mitigating circumstances are proved, the presumption is that there were none[82]

§ 194. —— Insanity and Intoxication

a. Insanity
b Intoxication

a. Insanity

While in some jurisdictions the state has the burden of proof of sanity of the accused, ordinarily the burden of proof of insanity relied on as a defense is regarded as resting on the accused.

While in some jurisdictions the burden of proving the sanity of accused rests on the state,[83] in a majority of jurisdictions, if a homicide or assault with alleged intent to kill is shown, accused has the burden of proving his insanity[84] at the time of the homicide,[85] if it is relied on as a defense, unless such insanity appears from the facts surrounding the crime[86] In either case the prosecution in the first instance may rely on the presumption of sanity.[87]

However, there is authority that, where evidence is introduced by accused or the state sufficient to raise a reasonable doubt of accused's sanity at the time of the homicide, the presumption of sanity ceases, and the burden of establishing sanity is on the state[88]

Proof of temporary or recurrent insanity of accused does not shift to the prosecution the burden of proving accused's sanity at the time of the homicide[89] If habitual, chronic, or permanent insanity

justification remains on the prosecution throughout the trial —Adkins v Commonwealth, 168 S W 2d 1008, 293 Ky 329

is shown, the burden of proving that the offense was committed during a lucid interval rests on the state.[90]

Where insanity is shown to exist prior to the killing, there is a presumption of its continuance[91]

b. Intoxication

The burden of proof of intoxication as a defense rests on the accused

The burden of proving the defense of intoxication is on accused[92] However, there is authority that, where such defense is made, the burden is on the prosecution to establish that accused at the time of the homicide was of sound mind[93]

Voluntary drunkenness does not affect the presumption of a general criminal intent arising from the homicide, if other attendant circumstances afford neither justification, excuse, nor mitigation.[94]

§ 195. —— Self-Defense

In some jurisdictions the accused has the burden of establishing self-defense. In others the burden is on the state to show that the homicide was not in self-defense.

Where accused asserts that his act was done in self-defense, the rule as generally stated is that the burden is on him to establish such fact,[95] unless circumstances showing self-defense arise out of the evidence produced against him to prove the homicide[96] However, in some jurisdictions, on the ground that the burden of establishing the guilt of accused rests on the prosecution throughout the trial, a plea of self-defense is held not to place on

Affirmative defense

In a murder prosecution, intoxication is an "affirmative defense" akin to plea of insanity, and, as every man is presumed to be sane and to possess a sufficient degree of reason to be responsible for his crime until contrary is proved, burden of such defense is on accused—State v Cureton, 11 S E 2d 469, 218 N C 491

Degree of intoxication

(1) Accused has the burden of establishing the degree of his intoxication—Commonwealth v Walker, 129 A 453, 283 Pa 468

(2) The burden is on accused to show that he was so far intoxicated at the time of the homicide as to be incapable of forming a specific intent—State v Crietello, 197 N W 902, 197 Iowa 772

(3) Where accused asserts voluntary intoxication as a defense, it is incumbent on him to establish that degree of intoxication which rendered him incapable of forming the intent to kill, or of acting with premeditation—Long v State, 141 N E 691, 109 Ohio St 77

Mitigation of offense

Statutory rule

By statute in some jurisdictions it is specifically provided that the burden of proving circumstances which justify or excuse the homicide devolves on accused, unless the proof on the part of the prosecution sufficiently manifests or tends to establish such fact—People v Elliott, 22 P 207, 80 Cal 296—30 C.J p 145 notes 10, 11

Fact that state's evidence tends to show extenuating circumstances, however, does not relieve accused of the burden of establishing self-defense—State v. Banks, 129 S E 715, 99 W.Va. 711.

accused the burden of proving it,[97] or, as the rule is sometimes stated, the burden is on the prosecution to show that the act was not in self-defense[98] Even though the burden of proof on the whole case lies with the prosecution, however, the burden of evidence, or of going forward with the evidence, may be transferred to accused[99] Thus, where the state's evidence shows a felonious killing or assault, and nothing more, if accused relies on self-defense for acquittal he must adduce evidence substantially tending to prove it.[1]

Elements of defense Where the burden is on accused to establish or adduce evidence of self-defense, the burden is on him to show the necessity, or a properly justified belief in the necessity, of his act[2] So also he must show the absence of a reasonable mode of retreat or escape,[3] unless under the circumstances affirmatively appearing from the evidence there was no duty on accused to retreat[4] The burden does not rest on accused to show affirmatively that he was free from fault in bringing on the difficulty[5] On the contrary, when the ingredients of self-defense have been established, the burden is on the state to show that accused was not free from fault,[6] unless it has been shown that the killing was unnecessary for self-defense.[7] However, there is authority that one who pleads self-defense is required to show that he was without fault in bringing on the difficulty,[8] or that he was not the aggressor, unless it is otherwise proved[9] The state is not bound to prove that deceased was free from fault[10]

Attack on officer Where one who is under arrest, or whom it is attempted to arrest, asserts the doctrine of self-defense as against the arresting officer, the burden is on him to overcome the presumption that the officer had not exceeded his duty and powers[11]

Presumptions. Where a person kills another, there is no presumption that he acted in self-defense,[12] and there is no presumption that an accused pleading self-defense is at fault solely because he was the aggressor[13]

By express provisions of the statutes in some jurisdictions, when the homicide takes place to prevent murder, maiming, or disfiguring, if the weapon or means used by the person attempting or committing such murder, maiming, or disfiguring are such as would have been calculated to produce that result, it is to be presumed that the person so using them designed to inflict the injury[14] The rule does not apply to an assault with a weapon which is not deadly,[15] unless from the manner of its use the intention to kill evidently appears,[16] or where there is failure to show that deceased was at the time of the difficulty using or attempting to use the deadly weapon of which he was possessed[17] The mere fact that deceased had a knife in his hand at the time of the homicide does not of itself raise the presumption of intent to kill,[18] although the fact that deceased held a gun in his hand may raise such a presumption,[19] unless the gun was not being used or in a position to be used[20] One who was in the act of drawing his pistol while uttering threats against accused must be held to have been "using" a deadly weapon under the statute[21] The statute is applicable where deceased did not in fact have a deadly weapon but where accused reasonably believed that deceased had a deadly weapon with which he was about to attack him,[22] and where deceased attacked a companion in whose defense accused claims to have acted[23] The statute cannot be applied to raise a presumption of intent to kill against accused because of accused's use of a deadly weapon[24] Although the statute uses the phrase "when the homicide takes place" it has, without discussion of the point, been held applicable to cases where accused was accused merely of making an assault with intent to murder[25]

§ 196. —— Accident

The defense that a homicide was accidental is not usually considered an affirmative defense, but as a denial of criminal intent, placing the burden of proving such intent on the prosecution However, under statutes placing on the accused the burden of proving circumstances of mitigation, justification or excuse, there is authority extending such burden to a claim of accidental killing

The defense that the homicide was accidental is not considered as an affirmative defense,[26] but as a denial of criminal intent, placing the burden of proving such intent on the prosecution[27] However,

Homicide by misadventure

In a prosecution for manslaughter, the burden is not on accused to prove that the homicide occurred by misadventure but on the state to show an unintentional homicide due to a reckless disregard of others, an unlawful act malum in se or an act malum prohibitum proximately causing the homicide—State v Budge, 137 A 244, 126 Me. 223, 53 A L R 241.

under statutes placing on accused the burden of proving circumstances of mitigation, justification, or excuse where the commission of the homicide is proved, there is authority extending the burden to a claim of accidental killing [28]

There is no presumption that a killing was accidental [29]

Where accused claims that he shot to frighten deceased and accidentally killed him, the fact that at the time accused was angry, excited, or frightened will not necessarily raise the presumption that he failed to use due caution and circumspection [30]

§ 197. —— Other Particular Matters of Defense

The burden of proving matters of affirmative defense is on the accused

The burden is on accused to show that he killed to prevent murder[31] or the commission of a felony [32]

The burden has been held to be on accused to establish a defense that deceased committed suicide,[33] however, there is authority to the contrary [34]

Under a statute making the commission of an abortion resulting in death manslaughter in the first degree, unless it was necessary to preserve the life of deceased, the burden of proving the exception is on accused [35]

Where it is shown that accused sold a drink containing poison which caused death, the burden is on him to show that he did not put the poison into the drink or know it was there [36]

In a prosecution for an assault with a deadly weapon with intent to kill, accused has the burden of showing that the weapon was unloaded to sustain his defense that no assault was committed,[37] the presumption being that such weapon was loaded [38]

Defense of family or property Accused must show facts making apparent the necessity of exercising the defensive right of protecting his family or property [39]

The burden of proving an alibi, not being a matter peculiar to prosecutions for homicide, is considered in Criminal Law § 574

§ 198. Personal Relations

It has been both affirmed and denied that an additional presumption of innocence may grow out of the relation between the accused and the victim of the homicide, such as that of parent and child or husband and wife

There is authority that where a man is charged with the murder of his wife there is a strong presumption of innocence arising from the existence of the marital relation in addition to the legal presumption of innocence that exists in any case [40] Other authorities deny the existence of any such additional presumption in cases of wife murder,[41] or in the case of a parent charged with the murder of his child [42]

Where such presumption is asserted, it may, of course, be rebutted by evidence disproving the marital relation,[43] showing infidelity of accused,[44] ill treatment of deceased by accused,[45] or evidence of an unwilling marriage [46]

§ 199 Grade or Degree of Offense

A killing, or a killing with a deadly weapon, may raise a presumption of murder, the burden being on the accused to show that the offense was of a lower grade or excusable Under statutes defining murder and dividing it into degrees, ordinarily the proof of a killing or a killing with a deadly weapon raises a presumption of murder in the second degree.

As has been noted, malice, which as discussed supra § 14, is the feature distinguishing murder at common law and under statutes declaratory thereof, may be inferred from the killing under rules stated supra § 23 or from the killing with a deadly weapon, see supra § 25, in the absence of circumstances of alleviation, excuse, or justification Hence, under such circumstances, the presumption is that the homicide is murder,[47] and the burden is on accused to show that the offense was of a lower grade [48] Under statutes defining murder and dividing it into degrees, while the presumption from the proof of a killing or a killing with a deadly weapon in the absence of other evidence as to the circumstances of the killing may be that it was murder,[49] although as to this there is conflicting authority,[50] the circumstances essential under the particular statute to characterize the offense as murder in the first degree, such as deliberation and premeditation,[51] or a premeditated design to effect death,[52] or express malice,[53] or the deliberate purpose to take life or do some great bodily harm,[54] cannot be presumed Hence, under the operation of such statutes, ordinarily it is held that the murder is murder in the second degree, where the definition of such degree does not include the essential elements hrembefore stated,[55] the burden being on the

The state established a prima facie case when it produced evidence sufficient to show that accused killed deceased in the manner and in the county alleged in the indictment, thereby shifting to accused the burden of going forward with the evidence to show justification or such mitigating facts as would reduce the grade of homicide from murder, where state's evidence within itself did not show such justification or mitigation —Satterfield v State, 21 S E 2d 861, 68 Ga App 7

Presumptions that accused is innocent and that homicide is second degree murder may exist in the same case and together with other presumptions, force and effect of any or all of them being determinable after evidence is all in —Campbell v Commonwealth, 174 S E 856, 162 Va 818

Purpose of presumption

The presumption is not one established for the benefit and protection of a person charged with crime, but was originally adopted of necessity to assist the state in establishing a connected and complete prima facie case —State v Davis, 108 P 2d 641, 6 Wash 2d 696

The killing of officers of the law, while in the due and lawful performance of their duties, is presumed to be murder in second degree, in absence of contrary evidence —State v Lewis, 131 A 566, 3 W W Harr, Del, 123

Killing with a deadly weapon

(1) Generally a presumption of murder in the second degree arises from an intentional killing of a human being by another where a deadly weapon is used by him at a vital part of the body, in the absence of proof of other facts tending to show deliberation to raise such killing to prosecution to raise it to the first degree,[56] and on accused to reduce the grade of the crime.[57] However, under a statute making a homicide murder in the first degree when perpetrated with a premeditated design to effect the death of the person killed, it has been held that the presumption of the premeditated design essential to the conviction of murder in the first degree may arise from the unexplained fact of the killing,[58] and this is more obviously so where the statutory phrase "premeditated design" is construed as requiring merely an actual intent to kill,[59] although under a similar statute it has also been held that in order to determine the classification of the offense there must be something more than a mere proof of the killing,[60] and a like conclusion has been reached by some authorities under a statute making the presence or absence of deliberation and premeditation the distinction between murder in the first and second degrees.[61] Under a statute placing the burden of proving circumstances of mitigation, justification, or excuse on accused where the homicide by him has been proved, it has been held that where the state has proved the commission of a homicide by accused the presumption is that he is guilty of murder in either the first or second degree unless the proof offered by the state itself tends to reduce the offense to manslaughter or to show that the act was justifiable or excusable.[62]

Attendant circumstances As has been shown supra § 192, the premeditation or deliberation essential to murder in the first degree may be inferred from the facts and circumstances of the killing and hence, where the circumstances are developed by the evidence, they may be sufficient to raise a presumption of murder in the first degree,[63] and it has been held that, where the facts characterizing the homicide are developed by the evidence, a presumption as to the degree of the homicide cannot be invoked.[64]

murder in the first degree, or to show want of premeditation and malice to reduce the killing to manslaughter, or to show that such killing was excusable or justifiable—State v Miller, 143 S W 2d 241, 346 Mo 816—State v Cook, Mo, 44 S W 2d 90—State v Wampler, Mo, 58 S W 2d 266—State v Eason, 18 S W 2d 71, 322 Mo 1239—State v Snow, 238 S W 1069, 293 Mo 143

(2) The intentional use of a deadly weapon raises the rebuttable presumption that accused is guilty of murder in the second degree, but such presumption is not raised by the mere use of such a weapon—State v Debnam, 22 S E 2d 562, 222 N C 266

as to the grade of homicide rests on the evidence, and not on the presumption [65]

Rebuttal by evidence of prosecution. Where the state's own case shows adequate cause, reducing the offense to manslaughter, it is incumbent on the state to overcome the effect of such evidence to obtain a conviction of murder,[66] and accused may take advantage of the case as made by the state to reduce the homicide to manslaughter [67] So, where the state's evidence suggests an accidental killing or homicide by misadventure, the presumption of murder in the second degree does not arise [68]

Homicide in perpetration of felony Under a statute making a homicide committed in the attempted perpetration of a felony murder in the first degree, the prosecution must establish the fact that accused attempted the felony, and that death occurred as the outcome of such attempt [69] It is a legitimate assumption that one who plans a robbery or burglary, and by an overt act attempts to carry it out, has also planned to escape from the scene of his crime [70]

Murder by poison, lying in wait, etc Under statutes authorizing a conviction of murder in the first degree without proof of premeditation and deliberation under certain circumstances as in case of a homicide by poison, lying in wait, etc, proof of the intentional killing in such cases raises a presumption of murder in the first degree [71]

Murder without malice The burden is not on accused to prove the circumstances that would constitute the killing one on adequate cause or one of murder without malice as distinguished from murder with malice [72]

Treachery, etc In a jurisdiction where qualifying circumstances such as deliberate premeditation, treachery, or the like are essential elements required to raise a homicide to the degree of murder, such qualifying circumstances must be proved by the prosecution [73]

On a charge of involuntary manslaughter, the prosecution has the burden of proving that accused committed an unlawful act, not amounting to a felony, or an act not merely careless but also so rash and reckless as to approximate unlawfulness [74]

B ADMISSIBILITY IN GENERAL

§ 200. Statement of Rule

Generally speaking, the prosecution may show any matters tending to prove the elements of the homicide or the accused's participation therein, while the accused may show any matters tending to exculpate him or to reduce the grade of the offense, but to be admissible the evidence must be relevant, competent, and material to the issues

Broadly speaking, it is competent for the prosecution to show any matters which tend to establish any of the essential elements of the crime or to connect accused therewith, while accused may show any matters which justly tend to exculpate him or to reduce the grade of the offense [75] Any evidence which is otherwise pertinent and reasonably tends to show that a killing was unlawful is admissible in a prosecution for manslaughter even though the evidence may make a case of murder [76] Evidence, however, to be admissible must be relevant to the points in issue, and no circumstance is admissible which does not tend to establish a fact material to the prosecution or defense, or from which no presumption or inference can be reasonably drawn with reference to a material fact or inquiry involved in the issue [77] Where the peculiar circumstances inspiring the deed are subject to controversy and uncertainty, the prosecution may advance any theory within the range of human experience and reasonable probability, and support it by appropriate evidence,[78] and conversely, in a prosecution based on circumstantial evidence, testimony presenting a theory consistent with accused's innocence should not be excluded because the circumstances incriminating accused are more numerous or more cogent[79]

Proof of the corpus delicti may be made by any legal evidence Evidence of circumstances tending to establish it is admissible The accused may introduce evidence of any fact tending to show that the alleged victim is alive, or, if dead, that he did not die as the result of a criminal agency

Proof of the corpus delicti in a homicide case, that is, the fact of death by the criminal agency of another, may be made by any legal evidence[80] It has been said that the best proof of the corpus delicti is the finding and inspection of the dead body,[81] but, in the absence of direct evidence, the corpus delicti may be sufficiently proved by circumstantial evidence, as explained infra § 312, and evidence of circumstances tending to establish it is admissible[82] Any fact which tends to show that the alleged victim is still alive, or that the person killed did not die as the result of criminal agency, may be shown by accused,[83] as, for example, that the alleged victim has merely absented himself from home[84] In order to establish the fact of death and to rebut accused's claim that deceased has merely gone away, evidence of declarations and acts of deceased negativing any intention of leaving home is competent[85] Evidence of events happening after the disappearance of deceased, and which could not have influenced his departure, is not admissible to support such a claim by accused[86] Competent evidence of the fact of death is not rendered objectionable merely because the witnesses give other incompetent testimony[87] Notwithstanding the introduction of other evidence to prove the corpus delicti, it is proper to admit the remains in evidence[88]

It is not necessary that the corpus delicti should be proved beyond a reasonable doubt before other evidence may be introduced which corroborates it or strengthens reasonable inferences drawn therefrom[89]

Particular circumstances It is ordinarily competent to admit evidence of sundry particular circumstances tending to show the corpus delicti, such as the condition of the body when found,[90] and the previous physical condition of deceased[91]

Proof of bloodstains at or about the place where violence is alleged to have been inflicted,[92] or upon articles of deceased found in possession of accused and not satisfactorily explained,[93] is competent

Previous threats of accused against deceased, however, are not admissible as proof of the corpus delicti,[94] and in a prosecution for wife murder it is not competent to admit evidence of the relations between accused and other women to prove the corpus delicti[95]

that a crime has been committed it is improper in the trial of a homicide case to admit in evidence the confession of accused,[96] but such confessions are properly admitted in conjunction with other evidence of the corpus delicti,[97] as where there is evidence from which the jury might reasonably infer the commission of the offense charged,[98] it being unnecessary to establish the corpus delicti beyond a reasonable doubt before evidence of the prisoners' confessions can be admitted.[99]

In infanticide cases Where the subject of the homicide is a newborn infant, a nonexpert may testify as to its having been a fully developed child.[1]

§ 202. Identity of Deceased

a In general
b Body not lost or destroyed

a. In General

The identification of the body of the alleged victim is a material fact of which any competent evidence, direct or circumstantial, is admissible, but uncertain and remote evidence on such issue may be excluded

The identification of the body of a person alleged to have been murdered is a material fact of which competent evidence is admissible,[2] and circumstantial evidence is admissible to show identification.[3] Where, however, such evidence is uncertain, indefinite, and remote it may properly be excluded.[4] Proof by accused that the person alleged to have been murdered was seen by divers persons at various places after the time of the alleged murder cannot be rebutted by the prosecution by evidence that a person resembling deceased was at and about such places at the times stated.[5]

b. Body Not Lost or Destroyed

Where deceased's body is recovered, it is competent to prove its identity by relatives or acquaintances who are enabled to identify it by certain peculiar marks or other points of resemblance.

Where the body of deceased is recovered, it is competent to prove its identity by relatives or acquaintances who are enabled to identify it by certain peculiar marks, as birthmarks, or other points of resemblance,[6] even though the body may be mutilated and many of the features destroyed,[7] but it has been held that the witness can testify only as to the points of resemblance, and not to positive identity.[8] It is not essential that the witnesses testifying as to the identity of the body should have seen it, their testimony as to identity may be based on a minute description of it given by others who saw it, and who did not know deceased,[9] or the body may be identified by articles found thereon.[10] Accused will not be permitted to support a claim that the body found is not that of the person alleged to have been murdered by proof that the latter stated before his disappearance that he intended to leave and never make himself known.[11] It is improper to admit in evidence a membership card of a particular organization, found on the person of deceased, for the purpose of appealing to members of the jury who are members of the same organization, although ostensibly for the purpose of establishing the name of the victim.[12]

c. Body Wholly or Substantially Destroyed

Where the victim's body is substantially destroyed, evidence of the facts and circumstances surrounding the scene of the alleged crime is admissible where it tends to prove the identity of the victim

Where the body of the victim is substantially destroyed, evidence of the facts and circumstances surrounding the scene of the alleged crime is admissible where it tends to prove the identity of the victim.[13] So if the body is substantially destroyed, as by fire, its identity may be established by proof that deceased was accustomed to wear or carry certain articles found at the place of destruction,[14] and the length of time elapsing between the time of wearing such articles and the disappearance affects only the weight, not the competency, of such evidence,[15] or the identification may be made by proof identifying unconsumed fragments of the clothing as being parts of similar clothing worn by deceased.[16] Identity may also be shown by proof on the part of those acquainted with deceased that undestroyed portions of the body are parts of the body of the person missing.[17] Variance or uncertainty in such evidence goes to its credibility only, not its competency.[18] It is not competent for experts to testify that on account of natural and inevitable changes after death it is impossible for anyone to identify the dead person from his head preserved in alcohol.[19]

§ 203. Intent in General

To show the accused's criminal purpose and intent, evidence is admissible of the character and circumstances of the offense, of preceding threats or declarations, of the state of feelings between the persons involved, and of preparations

Evidence tending to show the criminal purpose and intent of accused is admissible in prosecutions for murder.[20] For this purpose, evidence is admissible of the character and circumstances of the offense,[21] of the state of feelings between the persons involved,[22] and of relevant circumstances preceding the commission of the offense,[23] such as preceding threats or declarations,[24] prior difficulties,[25] and preparations.[26] Evidence of the actions, conduct, and general demeanor of accused a short time before commission of the homicide is competent as tending to show his intent or state of mind at the time of the killing.[27] In the absence of evidence of intent based on the existence of ill feeling, evidence of friendly relations is inadmissible to show absence of intent,[28] nor may accused show absence of difficulty with, or threats toward, deceased by him on a particular occasion.[29] The opinion of a witness is not competent evidence of accused's intent.[30] Circumstances tending to rebut inference of intent to kill may be admitted on behalf of accused.[31]

Assault with intent to murder An intent to commit murder, necessary to sustain a conviction of assault with intent to commit murder, may be shown by direct evidence, such as an express confession or declaration of accused,[32] or by the acts and conduct of accused and other circumstances from which the jury may naturally and reasonably infer the intent.[33] In such prosecutions, evidence of the character of the means or instrument used,[34] the manner in which it was used,[35] the purpose to be accomplished,[36] the resulting wounds or injuries,[37] and the nature and extent thereof[38] is admissible to show the intent with which the assault was committed. Testimony that accused was an expert shot, offered to show that he could have killed his victim instead of merely wounding him had he so desired, has been held inadmissible on the issue of intent to kill, since lack of such intent does not necessarily follow from the fact of a mere wounding even by an expert shot.[39]

Interwoven threats

In murder prosecution, testimony of witness that accused had come to her home and said that three named persons, one of whom was victim, had to die because they knew too much about his counterfeiting business was properly admitted notwithstanding inclusion of other names in same threat, to show intent, since other names were so interwoven in threat that they were inseparable.—Bridges v. Suspicious remarks

In a prosecution of a wife for the murder of her husband, evidence of a remark by accused prior to the homicide that there was no justice in the county seat of the county where the homicide occurred, and that any one could commit murder and get clear, was admissible to show an intention on the part of accused to commit the crime.—State v. § 204. Malice, Deliberation, and Premeditation

The admissibility of evidence on the question of malice, deliberation, and premeditation is considered in detail infra §§ 205–212

Examine Pocket Parts for later cases.

§ 205. —— Attending Circumstances Admissible

As a general rule, the acts and conduct of accused and the other circumstances and facts attending the homicide may be shown on the question of malice, premeditation, or deliberation

As a general rule, the acts and conduct of accused and the other circumstances and facts attending the homicide may be shown on the question of malice,[41] premeditation,[42] or deliberation [43] The fierceness and atrocity of the attack, the circumstances under which it was made, the nature and extent of the injury inflicted, the condition of the body and wearing apparel, the deadly nature of the weapon used, and the manner of using it, are proper subjects of inquiry [44] Evidence is admissible of matters occurring before the homicide which legitimately tend to show malice[45] or premeditation [46] So, also, within proper limits, evidence of previous declarations and threats by accused, considered infra § 206, and of the state of feeling between the parties, considered infra § 208, is admissible Any fact or circumstance tending to show whether the prisoner had a previously formed design to take the life of deceased is admissible in evidence on the issue of malice [47] Accordingly in a prosecution of a mother for murder of her infant child, the state may show that, prior to the child's birth, the mother meditated its destruction [48]

Extent of inquiry matter of judicial discretion
The extent to which a witness may enter into detail in testifying as to communications made to accused for the purpose of showing his state of mind with respect to malice must be left largely to the discretion of the trial court—State v Bowers, 115 S E 303 122 S C 275

Evidence offered on the issue of malice, premeditation, or deliberation, however, is inadmissible where it has no legitimate bearing on such issue [49] Accordingly, it has been held that evidence tending to show a malevolent spirit, a wicked and abandoned disposition, without malice directed toward deceased, is inadmissible [50] So, also, the flight of accused following the commission of the offense is inadmissible to show premeditation and deliberation [51] Matters not known to accused are not admissible on the issue of malice [52]

Express or implied malice The acts of accused and other circumstances attending commission of a homicide are admissible on the issue of express malice [53] Implied malice is proved by showing that the killing was done suddenly, without justification or excuse and without provocation, or without sufficient provocation to reduce the homicide to manslaughter [54] Malice, express or implied, may also be proved by showing that an unlawful act resulting in the death of another was attended with such circumstances as are the ordinary symptoms of a wicked, depraved, and malignant spirit, without reference to what was passing in the mind of accused at the time he committed the offense [55] The fact that external circumstances may exist capable of proof showing express malice, such as declarations of accused or his lying in wait for deceased, does not prevent the proof of other circumstances from which malice may be implied [56]

The defense may introduce facts tending to explain circumstances relied on by the prosecution to show deliberation,[57] premeditation,[58] or malice,[59] but accused may not introduce irrelevant or immaterial evidence to negative malice [60] He cannot show habitual blind obedience to his father in commission of the homicide in rebuttal of the inference of malice,[61] and since the flight of accused is inadmissible on the question of premeditation and deliberation, as has been considered above in this section, the motive of the flight is not admissible to repel an inference of premeditation and deliberation [62] Where accused is charged with the commission of a murder in the course of an unlawful arrest, evidence respecting his belief that it was his duty to arrest deceased is incompetent on the issue of malice in fact [63]

a. In General

Subject to the general rules as to competency and relevancy, evidence of previous threats and hostile declarations by accused against deceased is admissible to show malice, premeditation, and state of mind

Subject to the general rules as to competency and relevancy,[64] threats of accused to do violence to the person eventually slain, and all declarations and demonstrations of personal hostility, are admissible in evidence, as evincing malice and premeditation and tending to prove the state of mind of accused [65] Such evidence is of special importance

when accused claims that the homicide was excusable or justifiable.[66] Evidence of previous threats and hostile declarations by accused, if otherwise competent, is admissible, even though the threats or declarations were not communicated to, or made in the presence of, deceased,[67] and despite the fact that such evidence may reveal a former arrest of accused[68] or reflect on his character,[69] and even though the place and precise time of the making of the threats are not shown.[70] Matters essential to the proper understanding of a threat may also be shown,[71] but evidence of prior threats attributed to, but not shown to have been made by, accused is inadmissible.[72] Even if the corpus delicti must be proved before threats of accused may be shown, it is enough that there is evidence making it a question for the jury.[73]

Express malice may be proved directly by showing the deliberate intent of accused expressed or declared in words at the time of the killing or shortly before it took place.[74]

timony of the assaulted party that he had heard accused was going to kill him is properly admitted [76]

Manslaughter. Where the charge is but for manslaughter, malice not being an element of the offense, as considered supra § 37, evidence of previous threats or declarations of accused is inadmissible [77]

Testimony in rebuttal of evidence of threats of accused, in order to be admissible, must be shown to relate to the same occasion [78]

b. Nature of Threat or Declaration

An expression, to be admissible as a threat, must indicate a hostile purpose on the part of the speaker. Reckless, profane, or idle remarks not involving a threat to do violence are not as a rule admissible to show malice

An expression, to be admissible as a threat, must be of such character or made under such circumstances as to indicate a hostile purpose on the part of the speaker.[79] Reckless, profane,[80] or idle[81] remarks, or general complaints,[82] not involving a threat to do violence to anyone are not as a rule admissible to show malice, but evidence of general statements showing a malevolent or hostile spirit is sometimes admitted although not embodying a specific threat to kill [83] Language which may be properly construed as a threat to kill is admissible,[84] and words which, under the circumstances, imply a threat may be shown [85] Threats are admissible on the question of malice even though ostensibly made in jest,[86] in a thoughtless and bragging manner,[87] or although they refer to a means different from that which was actually employed [88] Where subsequent acts of accused clearly show that his prior threats did not refer to such acts, however, it is error to admit such threats [89]

Conditional threats are admissible to show malice, premeditation, or criminal intent,[90] as in the case of accused's threats to kill deceased if he talked too much,[91] or to inflict bodily harm if deceased disobeyed accused,[92] but it must appear that the conditions were fulfilled before threats of this character become competent evidence[93]

c. Against Whom Directed

As a general rule, general threats to kill, not shown to have any reference to deceased, are not admissible in evidence, but a threat to kill or injure some one not definitely designated is admissible where other facts adduced give individuality to it

General threats by accused to kill or injure some one,[94] or statements showing a general malevolent spirit,[95] which are not shown to have any reference to deceased are not as a rule admissible on the question of malice, deliberation, or premeditation General threats not referring to anyone in particular, however, may be admissible under certain circumstances[96] Thus a general threat to kill or injure someone, not definitely designated, is admissible when other facts adduced give individuality to it so that, as it is generally held, the jury may infer that the threat referred to deceased,[97] or when the threat was made shortly before the commission of the crime to which it may be construed to refer[98]

In order that threats, claimed to have been made against deceased, may be admissible, the language used, or the circumstances under which it was used, must be broad enough to include deceased within its terms[99]

Threats against a class Threats to do violence to a class of persons, one of whom became the victim, are admissible to show malice and state of mind, even though no particular person was named by accused[1] Thus threats against peace officer or officers[2] or members of a particular family[3] are admissible, where deceased was a member of the class referred to Evidence of threats against a class, however, is not admissible when the cause of the fatal difficulty did not relate to the connection of deceased with such class[4]

Threats against third persons Ordinarily a threat by accused to kill or injure a person other than deceased is not admissible to show malice toward deceased,[5] but such a threat may be admissible where it is of such a character as, under the circumstances of the killing, to be applicable to deceased,[6] or where there is a connection between the threat and the crime[7] In a case of mistaken identity, where accused, intending to kill one person, killed another, evidence of threats by accused against the person really intended is admissible on the same principles and for the same reasons as though such person had been killed under the same circumstances.[8] So, also, where accused fires at one man and kills another, evidence of his state of feelings or threats toward his intended victim is competent to show the intention with which the fatal shot was fired[9]

d. Time of Threat or Declaration

While evidence of prior threats may be rejected under certain circumstances because of remoteness, such objection is ordinarily regarded as affecting the weight and not the admissibility of the evidence.

While evidence of prior threats may be rejected under certain circumstances because of remoteness,[10] such objection is ordinarily regarded as affecting the weight and not the admissibility of the evidence[11] Threats, even though remote, are competent when it appears that they were repeated

Threat held not one against class

In prosecution for murder of hunter on accused's ranch, evidence as to three occurrences when accused shot at and threatened to shoot other named hunters was not competent on theory that evidence showed threats directed against hunters as class and made out general violent and malignant disposition of accused toward all hunters, in view of evidence that many persons hunted on accused's premises, since accused might have merely objected to named hunters' use of his premises--Lawrence v State, 82 S W 2d 647, 128 Tex Cr. 416

Continued threats connected with same matter

In prosecution for killing accused's creditor, testimony of threats made three years, fifteen months, less than a year, and one nearer in point of time and previous to homicide, all of which threats had to do with collection of debt by attachment process, was properly admitted, there being proof of continued ill feeling on part of accused toward creditor —Huff v Commonwealth, 122 S W 2d 143, 275 Ky 578

Threats at frequent intervals

Evidence of threats and quarrels between accused and deceased occurring at frequent intervals up to date of homicide was not objectionable as remote — State v Bowenkamp, Mo, 39 S W 2d 753

Continuing threat

Even though evidence of continuing threats was essential to competency of a threat made two years prior to homicide, requirement was sufficiently met by testimony of threat made a month before shooting and a threat made a week and a day before shooting —State v Bright, 2 S E 2d 541, 215 N C 537

In prosecution for killing policeman, testimony that one of the defendants had threatened to shoot any policeman was not rendered inadmis-

Subsequent friendly relations. The objection that the threats are incompetent because it was shown that accused and deceased met afterward and that their relations appeared to be friendly is not well taken because it bears on the probative force of the threats rather than on their competency.[19] With added reason, a threat is not to be excluded on this ground where the fact of reconciliation is not clear[20]

Proving time when threats were made. Evidence of the time when threats were made by accused against decedent is properly admitted, although it does not fix the time with exactness[21]

§ 207. —— Threats by Victim

The victim's prior threats against accused, if not too remote to be of evidential value, are admissible to show the victim's state of mind and, where communicated to the accused, may be admissible to rebut malice of the latter. Threats of the victim against a third person have been held inadmissible

As a general rule a threat by the victim of the homicide or assault, directed toward accused, is admissible only in connection with evidence tending to establish self-defense, under principles discussed infra § 276, and is not admissible primarily to show malice on the part of accused,[22] nor, where threats are introduced in connection with evidence of self-defense, can the inference be drawn from them without other evidence that accused was influenced by them to act maliciously[23] A prior threat by the victim against accused may be admissible to throw light on the animus, malice, or state of mind of the victim,[24] even though not communicated to accused,[25] and, if communicated, may be considered for the purpose of rebutting malice on the part of accused,[26] to show the purpose of accused in slaying his victim,[27] or to enable the jury to understand the state of mind of the prisoner, the apprehension of danger under which he acted, and his conduct at the time of the difficulty.[28] If the evidence in respect of the homicide tending to prove the guilt of the prisoner is wholly circumstantial, and the character of the slaying is in doubt, evidence of previous threats by deceased against accused are admissible as tending to remove the doubt[29] The surrounding circumstances or details of a threat by the victim against accused are inadmissible[30]

Statements not amounting to threats, made by the victim, and not otherwise relevant to the issues of the case, are inadmissible[31] Accusations by deceased against accused are admissible to elucidate an alleged threat by accused[32]

In Texas under a statute abolishing manslaughter and permitting state or accused to offer testimony of relevant facts surrounding a killing and the previous relationship between accused and deceased and the former's condition of mind, it has been held that the statute does not extend or broaden the rules of evidence in homicide cases, but merely secures to accused the benefit of rules of evidence available under the repealed law of manslaughter, and evidence proffered as to opinions expressed by third persons to accused before the homicide that deceased would kill accused, which would have been inadmissible under the repealed law, because not amounting to actual threats by deceased against accused, remain inadmissible under the new statute —Mercer v State, 13 S W 2d 689, 111 Tex Cr 657

Accusation explanatory of threat

It was competent for the state to show that deceased charged accused with stealing deceased's cotton, and that accused said he was going to "settle with him and settle with him in the ground," the preceding accusation elucidating the alleged threat. Rice v State, supra.

Time of threat In order for threats by deceased against accused to be admissible in a homicide case, the evidence must disclose with reasonable certainty the time when they were made The burden rests on accused to prove that a threat by deceased was not too remote to be of evidential value, doubts on the question of remoteness will be resolved against the admissibility of the threat, and, where the threats by deceased against accused were made at a time so remote from the acts which they are offered to color as to be of no evidential value, they should be excluded [33]

Threats against third persons Threats made by deceased against persons other than accused have been held inadmissible [34]

§ 208. —— State of Feeling between Parties in General

a General principles
b. Difficulties between persons in family relationship
c. Time of difficulty

a. General Principles

The general rule admits, on the issues of malice, premeditation, and state of mind, evidence of prior difficulties between victim and accused, but excludes evidence relative to the details thereof. Evidence of prior difficulties between third persons may be admissible where relevant to the offense, but not otherwise Evidence of friendly feelings may be admissible in rebuttal

Evidence as to ill will, prior difficulties, and other circumstances characterizing the disposition and attitude of accused and deceased toward each other is, subject to the general rules as to competency and relevancy, admissible as bearing on questions of malice, intent, motive, state of mind, or feeling,[35] as, for example, evidence that prior to the homicide accused was looking for deceased in a hostile mood,[36] or had made previous assaults or attacks on deceased,[37] or previous attempts to kill him [38] Only the fact and not the details of the prior difficulty may be shown,[39] and evidence as to its cause, merits, or particulars is inadmissible,[40] although this rule does not preclude the showing of connected actions and transactions leading up to, and explanatory of, the offense, even though not a part of the res gestae, where they throw light on accused's actions or mental attitude at the time or his participation as accessary[41] nor is it an infringement of such rule against showing details to prove the words of an opprobrious epithet evincing ill will between the parties,[42] or to prove the use of threatening language by accused in connection with his prior difficulty with deceased[43]

In a prosecution for assault with intent to kill evidence of a previous difficulty between the parties is admissible to show malice,[44] but it is improper to admit evidence of all the particulars of the trouble[45] It has been held that where accused was clearly the aggressor, and where no issue of self-defense is involved in a prosecution for assault with intent to kill, it is proper to exclude evidence of bad feeling and prior difficulties between the victim and accused offered by the latter[46] Evidence as to the state of mind of a third person is ordinarily inadmissible in a prosecution for assault with intent to kill[47]

Extent of injuries in previous assault

Conceding that the state in a prosecution for murder could properly prove accused's previous assault and battery of deceased, as tending to show his malice, or purpose in the homicide committed several months later, nevertheless it was incompetent to admit evidence detailing the nature and extent of injuries suffered by deceased on the occasion of such prior assault, this being a collateral matter which was not connected with the crime for which accused was on trial—Keifer v State, 154 N E 870, 199 Ind 10.

Calling police in another connection evidence of prior difficulties between third persons may become admissible where it throws light on the offense and accused's connection therewith is shown,[49] as where he participated therein,[50] although even in such a case the details thereof are inadmissible[51] Threats by one third person against another third person are inadmissible in the absence of relevancy to the offense[52]

Rebuttal of malice Evidence as to feelings between the parties is not confined to feelings of hatred and hostility, where no deliberate killing is shown, evidence of kindness of accused to deceased is admissible as tending to show that the killing was unintentional or purely accidental,[53] but where a deliberate killing is shown, evidence that the prisoner was on friendly terms with deceased and his family is not admissible[54] Where prior disputes have been shown, accused may show that ill feeling and disputes between him and deceased had terminated prior to the homicide, and evidence offered for such purpose and going to the issue of existence of ill feeling at the time of the homicide should not be excluded on the theory that it shows details of the prior difficulties[55] On the other hand, it has also been held that evidence of details of the difficulty offered by accused in rebuttal should be excluded[56] Where the state has shown a reconciliation between deceased and accused and its cessation, as tending to show malice, accused can in rebuttal show reasons for both[57] Where the prosecution has shown a previous difficulty on the occasion of an arrest of decedent by accused, a policeman, for the purpose of showing the origin of the ill will of accused, but his authority to make the arrest is not in issue, evidence of local ordinances giving such authority is immaterial, and may be excluded[58]

b. Difficulties between Persons in Family Relationship

Evidence of prior mistreatment of, or difficulties with, a victim sustaining a marital or family relationship toward the accused is admissible, but details are ordinarily inadmissible On the trial of the accused for killing a third person during the course of the accused's assault on his own spouse, evidence of prior difficulties of the accused with his spouse becomes admissible

On trial for unlawful homicide or deadly assault on one sustaining a family relationship toward accused, evidence of previous difficulties, such as accused's cruel treatment of his victim on previous occasions, is admissible to show malice or state of mind,[59] as, for example, previous difficulties of accused with his brother,[60] daughter-in-law,[61] son,[62] son-in-law,[63] or spouse.[64] Evidence of the details or merits of prior difficulties between persons in a family relationship is ordinarily inadmissible,[65] and evidence of previous difficulties or acts of cruelty is not admissible unless there is evidence connecting accused with such acts.[66]

On trial for accidental killing of another while intending to slay spouse, whatever evidence of prior assaults would have been admissible on trial for assault of the spouse is admissible on trial for the homicide of the third person in fact killed.[67]

c. Time of Difficulty

Difficulties between the accused and his victim are admissible whether past or current in point of time, except where the difficulty is so remote in both time and circumstance as to afford no probative value. Remoteness in point of time ordinarily affects weight but not admissibility.

Evidence of difficulties between accused and deceased present and pending at the time of the homicide, as well as of prior difficulties, is admissible to show accused's malice and state of mind.[68] Evidence showing how long ill feeling had existed between the parties is proper.[69]

Remoteness. Evidence of difficulties so remote in time and circumstance as to have no relation to the difficulty under investigation is not admissible,[70] but, where the difficulties occurred within a time not too remote, or at any rate not too remote under prevailing circumstances, to be of probative value, evidence of prior difficulties are admissible as against the objection of remoteness,[71] and occur-

Insane ideas. In homicide prosecution, exclusion of testimony as to occurrences when

rences at a remote time are admissible when similar occurrences continued to the time of the homicide,[72] and it has been held broadly that the remoteness of the occurrence goes to the weight only, and not the admissibility of the evidence[73]

§ 209. —— Difficulty between Accused and Third Person

Evidence of previous difficulties between the accused and a third person is admissible where properly connected with the victim and offense, but not otherwise, and in any case evidence as to details of such a difficulty ordinarily is inadmissible.

Evidence is inadmissible to show a difficulty between accused and a third person in no way connected with the victim or offense,[74] or to show accused's state of mind toward such a person,[75] or to show threats made against accused by a person who was not present at the homicide and who is not shown to have been acting in concert with deceased[76] However, where their connection with the offense sufficiently appears, evidence of prior difficulties between accused and a third person[77] is admissible to show malice, premeditation, or general state of mind, as is evidence of accused's ill will toward a member of the family of deceased,[78] or that accused had a grudge against the companion of the victim at the time of the assault[79] Where the prosecution claims that accused killed deceased in an effort to kill a third person, evidence of former difficulties with the third person is admissible[80] Where deceased was a stranger to accused and was killed while intervening in a dispute between accused and a third person, it is proper to admit evidence of previous disputes between accused and such third person as throwing light on the trouble in which deceased participated[81]

Difficulty with deceased's son

(1) Evidence of drinking, and threats by defendants charged with murder, and of difficulty with deceased's son shortly before killing, was admissible to show predetermination to harm deceased or son —Woodard v Commonwealth, 14 S W 2d 773, 228 Ky 254

(2) In a prosecution for murder, it was proper to admit evidence of a difficulty between accused and a son of deceased from ten to thirty minutes before the killing, to show that accused was in an angry mood, as general demeanor of accused a short time prior to the homicide was competent as tending to show his state of mind at the time of the killing —Inman v State, 210 P 742, 22 Okl Cr 161

Details. Evidence as to details of prior difficulties between accused and a third person ordinarily is inadmissible [82]

§ 210. —— Difficulty between Victim and Third Person

Evidence of prior difficulties between the victim and a third person, or of prior threats by such third person, are inadmissible where not properly connected with the offense for which the accused is being tried, but may become admissible where their relevancy is duly shown, as by proof of conspiracy between a third person and the accused

Evidence of a difficulty between the victim and a third person in which accused took no part,[83] or of threats by a third person against the victim unassociated with a conspiracy and not otherwise connected with the offense,[84] ordinarily is inadmissible on the issues of malice or its rebuttal, or to show the state of mind or feeling between the persons involved Evidence of a statement or declaration by a third person to the victim is inadmissible where not sufficiently connected with the offense to have any bearing on the issues of the case [85] Difficulties between deceased and a relative of accused at a remote time are properly excluded where there is ample evidence of ill feeling between accused and deceased at the time of the homicide [86] Where, however, the relevancy and materiality of such evidence to the offense sufficiently appears, prior difficulties of a third person and the victim,[87] or threats of a third person against the victim,[88] are admissible, as where evidence of such character is rendered relevant by proof of conspiracy between the third person and accused,[89] or by proof that accused afterward espoused the cause of such third person and made the quarrel his own [90] In case of a neighborhood feud where accused and deceased were members of opposing factions, evidence of previous fights and quarrels between such factions in which accused participated is admissible [91]

Codefendants Where the third person is a codefendant, evidence of his threats against the victim,[92] or of his prior difficulties with the victim,[93] is admissible where through conspiracy or in any other wise they are relevant to the offense of accused However, threats made by a codefendant out of the presence of another codefendant have been held inadmissible,[94] and, where conspiracy is neither charged nor proved, and those accused are separately tried, threats made by a coindictee in the absence of one codefendant have been held inadmissible [95]

Details of a difficulty between the victim and a third person prior to commission of the offense have been held inadmissible [96]

Subsequent declarations of a third person acting in concert with accused and showing hostility toward the victim may be admissible [97]

Threat to "finish" victim following assault

In homicide prosecution, testimony that state's witness heard accused's companion say after companion had assaulted the deceased, that he had hit the deceased three times, and that he was going to finish deceased up before daylight, whether res gestae or not, was admissible, where there was evidence to sustain a finding that accused had in legal effect participated in the assault, that accused's companions did not know then that the assault would result in deceased's death, and that while still acting in concert they were bent on

§ 211. —— Subsequent Hostile Acts and Declarations by Accused

Subsequent hostile acts and declarations of the accused are admissible on the issue of malice and state of mind, where relevant to such conditions as of the time of the offense, but should be excluded where such relevancy does not appear.

Declarations by accused after the fatal affray showing his hostility to deceased are admissible in evidence on the issue of malice,[98] as are also declarations showing a depraved mind, regardless of human life,[99] although statements so remote in time and circumstance from the date of the homicide as to afford no probative weight are inadmissible[1] Acts or conduct showing continued hostility are admissible,[2] or, generally speaking, conduct of accused subsequent to the homicide which is directly connected with and tends to prove a preconceived plan and its continued execution, in which the homicide is but one of several acts planned, such evidence being admissible to characterize the homicidal act as unlawful and part of a premeditated criminal plan[3]

Indignity to the remains Any unseemly conduct toward the corpse of the person slain or any indignity offered it by the slayer should go to the jury on the question of malice[4]

Payment of funeral expenses. It has been held not proper to permit the state to prove, as showing malice, that accused failed to pay the burial expenses of his murdered wife,[5] but, where accused has testified that he offered to pay the funeral expenses of his victim, it is permissible for the state in rebuttal of such evidence as bearing on the issue of malice and ill will to offer evidence to the effect that accused did not pay the funeral expenses[6]

On a trial for assault with intent to murder, subsequent hostile statements of the assailant as to the person assaulted are admissible to show malice or state of mind at the time of the assault.[7]

§ 212. —— Acts in Preparation

Acts of preparation for the offense by accused ordinarily are admissible to show malice and state of mind, and by way of rebuttal the accused may introduce evidence furnishing an innocent explanation of such acts The preparatory acts of a third person are admissible only when properly connected with the accused and the offense sault with intent to kill,[9] it is competent to prove all the acts of accused in preparation for the commission of the homicide, inasmuch as preparation beforehand of the means with which to perpetrate the crime tends to show malice, deliberation, and a fixed deadly purpose, but the rule will not be extended so as to render admissible evidence of details deemed irrelevant or immaterial.[10] Evidence of acts of preparation is admissible even though such acts involve the commission of another crime,[11] and although other means were actually used in the commission of the crime than those prepared,[12] and objections raised as to the remoteness of evidence offered to show preparation go to weight rather than to admissibility.[13] Where there is evidence of preparation tending to show antecedent malice, accused has the right to show that such preparation was made in anticipation of an expected attack on himself or for some other innocent purpose.[14] It is competent to prove why accused was carrying a weapon at the time of the difficulty in order to negative criminal purpose,[15] but it is not competent to show that accused obtained an alleged permission to carry a pistol from an official lacking authority to issue such a permit,[16] nor, it has been held, may accused show the carrying of a weapon

Custom

Evidence in murder prosecution that accused habitually carried pistol was admissible to rebut state's theory he armed himself specially to kill deceased—Little v State, 139 S E 37, 164 Ga 509.

Possession of money

Evidence that accused carried a large sum of money on his person was admissible in explanation of why he carried a pistol, and corroborative evidence of a police officer should have been admitted in support thereof—Powers v State, 184 N E 549, 204 Ind 472, 86 A L R 166.

for use in an occupation not requiring him to go armed,[17] and, where one committed a homicide while off duty, it has been held proper to exclude evidence that he was instructed to carry arms while on duty.[18] Evidence of the fact that accused lacked a permit to carry a weapon has been held inadmissible.[19] Accused may show that, before he made the preparation in evidence, he made an unsuccessful effort to protect himself by legal proceedings.[20]

Acts of third persons It is competent to show the acts of a third person in preparation for the offense where there is evidence of his acting in concert with accused and of his presence at the scene and time of the offense,[21] but it is not competent to show acts and conduct of a third person, who was not present or participating in the difficulty in question.[22]

§ 213. Commission of or Participation in Act by Accused

Evidence which actually tends to show accused's connection, or lack of connection, with the commission of the crime is relevant and admissible

Evidence tending to connect accused with the commission of the crime is always admissible,[23] as, conversely, is evidence tending to show the innocence of accused,[24] but evidence claimed to have this tendency must have the requisite relevancy.[25]

§ 214. Ability and Opportunity

Evidence that accused had an opportunity to commit the crime is admissible, as is also evidence that he possessed a weapon or instrument of the kind apparently used, or otherwise possessed the means for committing the homicide, and evidence in rebuttal of evidence of opportunity or possession of means is likewise admissible

Subject to the general rules as to competency and relevancy, proof that defendant had in his possession the means,[26] as, for example, a weapon or instrument of the character apparently used in the commission of the homicide,[27] that he owned the weapon used,[28] or had access to a weapon found near the body of deceased,[29] or claimed to have the peculiar skill,[30] or, where he denies it, that he had the skill,[31] for committing the homicide in the manner in which it was committed, is admissible on the question of his ability to commit it. Accused may show in rebuttal that he did not have, at the time of the homicide, an instrument or weapon of the kind used in its commission,[32] but, where he testifies, that he did not have such a weapon at the time, it is not error to reject the testimony of other witnesses, not with him at the time, that he did not then own or possess such a weapon;[33] and the exclusion of evidence that the weapon was not in his immediate and visible possession at a time between his admitted possession thereof and the homicide is not error.[34] Evidence as to the physical condition of the parties is considered infra § 224.

Opportunity Evidence that defendant had an opportunity to commit the crime is always competent,[35] and the probability of accused's guilt may be shown by the lack of opportunity on the part of others.[36] Such proof may be rebutted by evidence that the crime was not committed until after accused's opportunity therefor had passed.[37]

a. In General

Competent evidence tending to identify accused as the guilty person, and show his presence at the scene of the crime, is admissible, as is also competent evidence in rebuttal thereof.

Subject to general rules excluding incompetent evidence,[38] any evidence tending to identify accused as the guilty person,[39] and show his presence at the scene of the crime,[40] is relevant and admissible, especially where proof of his guilt depends alone on circumstantial evidence.[41] Such testimony need not be positive, uncertainty affecting only its weight and not its admissibility.[42] So, also, the testimony is not rendered incompetent by accused's denial that he was the person seen by the witness on the day, and near the scene, of the homicide.[43] Evidence of accused's identity cannot be reinforced by proof that the witness failed to identify others as the guilty parties.[44]

Reasons for identification Reasons for the identification are not essential to render the testimony admissible,[45] but they may be given.[46]

Rebuttal Competent evidence may be received in rebuttal of the state's evidence as to the identity of accused,[47] and accused may prove his absence from the scene of the crime at the time of its commission.[48] In a prosecution based on circumstantial evidence, testimony creating a reasonable doubt as to the identity of the slayer should not be excluded because circumstances incriminating accused are more cogent[49] Where a witness has testified to seeing accused in the commission of the homicide, accused should be permitted to introduce evidence showing the witness' inability to identify him[50] Testimony as to accused's identity cannot be rebutted by proof that the witness thereto was silent when deceased stated that he did not know who his assailants were[51]

b. Declarations of, or Identification by, Person Other than Witness

While there is some divergence of authority as to the admissibility of extrajudicial declarations for the purpose of establishing identity or presence at the scene of the crime, such declarations are admissible when made by accused, and an identification out of court by decedent or the victim of an assault with intent to murder may be shown in evidence when it was made in the presence of accused.

The weight of authority favors the admissibility of declarations of deceased made shortly before the crime, which tend to prove the presence of accused at the time and place of the homicide,[52] but in some jurisdictions a contrary rule prevails[53] Evidence as to what occurred at the time accused was taken before decedent for identification is admissible,[54] and evidence of an identification then made by decedent is not subject to contradiction by evidence of a description of the guilty person's apparel given by decedent on another occasion when accused was not present[55] It has been held that the witness may testify to the fact of a conversation with deceased as to the identity of the slayer, but may not state the conversation[56] Also, it has been held not error to admit evidence that, as a result of deceased's identification of hats found at a lookout station, deceased and witness expected to find accused and another person at a still[57] Dying declarations are considered infra §§ 286–306

Declarations of accused It is proper to admit evidence of declarations of accused made several days before the crime indicating an intention to use a deadly weapon against deceased,[58] or to kill him[59] After accused's admission of his presence at the place of the murder, his previous denials of his presence may be shown[60]

Identification by victim of assault In a prosecution for assault with intent to murder, evidence that the victim of the assault identified accused, in the latter's presence and hearing, to an officer or at the police station is admissible[61]

Identification by third person The admissibility of testimony as to an identification of accused by a third person has been both affirmed[62] and denied[63]

c. Tracks and Fingerprints

Proper evidence tending to show that tracks or prints were found at or near the scene of the homicide and that they were or were not made by accused, or by an animal or vehicle he was using, may be admissible, but evidence offered for this purpose must be connected with the crime charged or involved and have a bearing on defendant's guilt or innocence

It is permissible to show that footprints or shoe tracks near where deceased's body was found were similar to those made by accused,[64] although no comparison is made except the size of the shoe,[65] and no measurement is made[66] Evidence is admissible to identify a shoe which had been fitted to tracks at the scene of the homicide as that of accused,[67] or to show the resemblance of tracks found in the direction in which the state claims accused went after the crime to those of accused,[68] or that tracks were found leading from where deceased was found to a place accused was shown to have been near the time of the homicide,[69] and such evidence is admissible, notwithstanding the tracks were not found immediately after the homicide.[70] As a predicate for such proof it is not incumbent on the state to introduce evidence to negative their presence there before the homicide,[71] but it would seem that the admissibility of such testimony is largely one of application to the particular case and the particular facts and environment as developed on the trial.[72]

Animal or vehicle tracks It is competent to prove that the feet or shoes of a horse belonging to accused fit corresponding tracks found at or near the place of the killing,[73] or that the tracks of an automobile were those of accused's machine.[74] Also, testimony concerning the finding of mule tracks may be admissible in connection with other evidence of accused's use of another's mule on the day of the homicide and having been seen walking toward the place where the tracks were found.[75]

Fingerprints or marks Accused's testimony may be an answer to a contention that evidence concerning his fingerprints is inadmissible because of a failure to show the time when the fingerprints were made.[76] In a prosecution for homicide in the commission of a robbery accused should be permitted to show that a fingerprint found on the article stolen was not that of accused.[77] However, the rejection of evidence, offered by accused, of a description of finger marks has been sustained where it was not distinctly claimed by him that the so-called finger marks were capable of measurement and comparison with his fingers,[78] and, where there is no claim or evidence that any fingerprints on a particular article are those of accused, evidence of the handling of the article by others is inadmissible on the question of accused's guilt unless it is in some way connected with the crime charged.[79]

d. Bloodstains and Other Marks of Crime

If consistent with the state's theory of the killing, evidence of bloodstains and other marks of the crime on the person or property of accused is admissible, as is also evidence of correspondence of a bloody imprint of a hand or shoe, on the wall or floor at the place of the homicide, with the hand or shoe of accused.

Evidence of bloodstains and others marks of the crime on the person or property of accused may be admitted,[80] as, for example, of a spot of blood on his clothes,[81] together with a physician's analysis thereof,[82] of bloody articles found in accused's room soon after the murder,[83] of the condition of accused's clothing found in his room the morning after the crime,[84] of a trunk and its contents which was shown to have been used by accused and his wife and which contained his bloody garments,[85] or of the finding of hair about accused of the same color as that of the person killed.[86] Also, evidence of correspondence of a bloody print of a hand on the wall where a homicide occurred with the hand of accused is admissible,[87] but, where distinctive footprints were left in blood on a linoleum covered floor, evidence relating to a sale of shoes is properly restricted to shoes capable of making imprints similar to those made at the place of the crime[88] Where the state's theory of the killing is inconsistent with the presence of bloodstains, evidence on the part of accused that certain stains were not bloodstains is irrelevant.[89]

e. Articles Possessed by Accused

It may be shown that accused wore or possessed articles of clothing or other articles which the evidence indicates were associated with the crime

It is always permissible to show that accused wore or possessed articles of clothing[90] or other articles[91] which the evidence indicates were associated with the crime Dirt taken from the scene of the crime to be compared with dirt found on accused's clothing is admissible[92] So evidence is admissible as to cartridges found on the person of accused,[93] as to the character of shot taken from the pockets of clothes shown to belong to accused,[94] as to the similarity of an animal ridden near the scene of the homicide to that of accused,[95] and as to statements of accused tending to connect him with a mask found at the scene of the murder[96] Subsequent possession by accused of property of deceased is considered infra § 250

Where there is evidence that the murderer wore striped overalls and a black shirt, accused has a right to show that the employees at the place where he worked wore clothing of a different character,[97] and, where a witness for the state has identified accused as having been at the scene of the homicide wearing a certain kind of cap, and witnesses for the defense have testified that accused wore no such cap on the day of the killing, the state may, in rebuttal, show by a witness that on the day after the homicide accused wore such a cap[98]

f. Other Matters

Particular facts and circumstances of various character have been held admissible, and others have been held inadmissible, to prove or disprove the identity or presence of accused.

In particular prosecutions facts and circumstances of various natures have been held admissible[99] or inadmissible[1] to establish the identity or presence of accused For example, it has been held proper to admit evidence tending to show that accused saw deceased as he passed his house and pursued him,[2] that accused threw a missile, comprehended within the indictment, at the injured person,[3] that immediately after shooting deceased, accused entered a room and shot at another person whom, as well as deceased, he had previously threatened,[4] that just after the shooting accused appeared at a near-by house and renewed his shooting there,[5] and that accused was seen shortly after the homicide, running his car in the same particular manner in which the car which ran over and killed deceased was run at the time of the accident[6] So, also, it is proper to admit evidence of a previous altercation with accused and pursuit by him,[7] or previous ill-treatment of deceased by accused,[8] accused's presence and complicity in a robbery, for which he was arrested by the officer whom he is charged with killing,[9] or that he was a member of the band of robbers;[10] the hearing of accused's voice by one familiar with it,[11] and of outcries of deceased, or another who was also killed at or near the same time and place, made at the time of the assault.[12] The testimony of a witness which demonstrates the fact that the report of a gun fired at the place where the dead body was found could be heard at the home of another witness is admissible to corroborate the testimony of the other witness that he heard the report of a pistol within fifteen or twenty minutes after accused and deceased left his home.[13] The absence of other persons who might have committed the crime may be shown as tending to increase the probability that accused, who was the last person seen with deceased, committed it.[14]

Evidence of statements of a witness to accused at or near the time of the homicide may be admitted as part of the identification,[15] and testimony of a witness, for the purpose of showing that accused was seen near the scene of the homicide shortly before it occurred, that the witness spoke to a companion with reference to accused, without stating what was said, is admissible.[16]

The identity of accused as the person who was previously tried for, and convicted of another offense may be proved by the clerk or deputy clerk of the court wherein the former conviction was had[17] or by the son of decedent for whose murder accused was previously convicted.[18]

Inadmissible evidence It is proper to exclude a question, on cross-examination of a witness for the state, as to the name of the officer to whom the witness gave a description of a person he saw,[19] and the testimony of a theater patron that a theater cashier failed to identify him, which was offered to impeach the cashier's testimony identifying accused, where the cashier had not been asked about such patron on cross-examination and his attention had not been called to him by such an incident as directed his attention to accused.[20] After it has elicited from accused, on cross-examination, the information that he was known by two different names, the state may not prove by a witness that in a certain county accused used only one of such names.[21] The conduct of persons before whom accused was brought for identification is incompetent to prove his identity.[22]

Failure of witness to testify as expected Where accused proposed to prove by witnesses that they identified another, but the witnesses denied the identification, and all they could relate about it was elicited from them, there is no merit in a claim that their testimony was erroneously excluded or not admitted as offered.[23]

§ 216. —— Participation with Others

Noteworthy latitude is allowed in the admission of evidence where it is claimed that accused participated in a conspiracy to commit the crime or was an accessary to the person who did the killing

A wide range of evidence is permitted in a prosecution for murder pursuant to a conspiracy.[24] Sub-

Association of voice with person who shot victim

Refusal to exclude statement of witness who had testified that she did not know accused, to effect that while in bed on night of shooting she had heard man who shot victim call victim three times was not harmful if error where witness's further testimony disclosed a basis of fact on which she could have reasonably associated voice which called with the man who fired and other witnesses testified that accused had called to victim as if to identify him and had thereafter fired.—Hurston v. Particular evidence

(1) Evidence of declarations of accused and his companions made a few moments antecedent to the homicide were admissible as tending to show that accused and his companions were acting together in their preparation to kill deceased with a common purpose.—Pinkston v. State, 241 S.W. 152, 91 Tex.Cr. 644.

(2) Evidence of the measurement and description of footprints of accused's brother who was also alleged to be implicated in the killing, and evidence that on the afternoon of his disappearance deceased was seen with brother of accused was admissible.—Mercado v. State, 258 S.W. 180, 96 Tex.Cr. 150.

(3) In a prosecution for murder of a Chinese member of the Suey Sing tong, by members of the Hop Sing tong, in a conspiracy forming part of a tong war the district attorney was properly permitted to show that defendants were active members of the Hop Sing tong and occupied official positions therein. Also, where the prosecution had

ject to the general rules as to relevancy and competency,[25] the prosecution may introduce evidence tending to show the fact[26] and nature[27] of a conspiracy between accused and others who were acting with him at the time of the homicide, and it is competent to prove a conspiracy among third persons to commit the crime, without showing knowledge or concurrence by accused at that time, if he is afterward by competent evidence connected with the conspiracy.[28] Where the killing was done by another person, any legal evidence tending to connect accused with the killer is material and relevant.[29] Evidence of the communication of instruction, advice, or counsel by accused as accessary to the person who actually committed the deed is admissible,[30] whether the communication was directly by word, act, or deed,[31] or through a third person,[32] and evidence of details of a prior difficulty between deceased and accused is admissible to show that accused was in fact an accessary and, as such, participated in the fatal difficulty.[33] Even in a prosecution for being an accessary before the fact, evidence of accused's conduct immediately after the perpetration of the crime is admissible where it affords some basis for an inference that he had knowledge of the crime at the time of its commission,[34] but evidence of the subsequent conduct of an aider and abettor is competent only against him and not against a codefendant who did the killing,[35] and evidence of a statement made by an alleged conspirator after the conspiracy, if any, was ended, is not admissible against accused.[36]

On the theory that accused was an accessary or conspirator, and in connection with other evidence, a witness may be permitted to testify that he saw the principal or another conspirator at a certain time and place,[37] and it is relevant to prove that another person jointly indicted with accused was, prior to the killing, possessed of a pistol of the caliber corresponding to the size of the empty shells found at the place of the homicide immediately thereafter,[38] and also, where only one shotgun was used, testimony as to which one of several defendants had it in his hands is competent.[39] Subject to proof of agency for accused, evidence of an agreement made by a person who hired an automobile connected with the homicide as to the length of time he was to use it is admissible.[40] On the other hand, shown that defendants were members of the Hop Sing tong and deceased a member of the Suey Sing tong, and that hostilities existed between the two tongs, it was proper for the district attorney to go fully into the question whether defendants were gunmen or members of the highbinders branch of the Hop Sing tong.—People v. Jo Fong, 210 P. 548, 59 Cal.App. 259.

(1) In accordance with the general rule applicable in criminal prosecutions that one of several persons who have been indicted jointly becomes a competent witness for the prosecution against his codefendants where the indictment or information is dismissed as to him, stated in Criminal Law § 804 c. (1), the prosecution is entitled to use as a witness a codefendant, against whom the charge has been dismissed, for the purpose of showing accused's participation in the homicide.—People v. Braun, 88 P.2d 728, 31 Cal.App.2d 593.

Association

(1) Where the prosecution claimed that defendants aided and abetted codefendants in committing a murder, it was not error to admit evidence that two days prior to the homicide defendants and codefendants were traveling on the same train in the direction of the scene of the homicide, and that codefendants were armed.—People v. Ho Kim You, 141 P. 950, 24 Cal.App. 451, followed in People v. Yee Yum, 141 P. 958, 24 Cal.App. 470.

(2) Where two or more persons are tried for murder, it is competent to prove that they were together or near the place where deceased might have been expected to be found shortly before the time at which the homicide was committed.
La.—State v. Howard, 45 So. 260, 120 La. 311.
Mich.—People v. Marble, 38 Mich. 117.

Conspiracy as malice

(1) Proof of conspiracy to commit murder is merely means of establishing malice.—Jeffries v. Commonwealth, 74 S.W.2d 203, 255 Ky. 365.

in a prosecution for murder growing out of an abortion, accused being claimed to be an accessary before the fact, testimony as to whether the witness knows that the doctor who performed the abortion has been convicted of the offense of abortion is properly excluded,[41] as is testimony that the doctor registered at a hotel under an assumed name[42]

Accused may show that meetings relied on to show a conspiracy were for a lawful purpose,[43] and where the prosecution has introduced evidence from which the jury might infer that certain acts of a particular person were done in pursuance of a plan to murder deceased, accused may in rebuttal introduce evidence tending to show that such acts were done in good faith and without collusion with him[44] On the other hand, it is proper to exclude evidence offered by accused which would not tend to show an absence of collusion between him and the person who did the killing and is not otherwise admissible,[45] and evidence of dislike or enmity between accused and the persons who did the killing, which might otherwise be admissible to disprove the alleged conspiracy, may be rendered inadmissible by accused's own explanations and admissions[46]

Generally speaking, any evidence, otherwise competent, tending to show that deceased did or did not come to his death by his own act is admissible where the theory of the defense is that deceased committed suicide, but there is a conflict of authority on the admissibility of evidence of a disordered mental condition to prove suicide, as well as to the effect of the time at which they were made, on the admissibility of evidence, of decedent's declarations of intention to commit suicide

Where the theory of the defense is that deceased committed suicide, any evidence otherwise competent tending to show that deceased came to his death by his own act is admissible,[47] but to be admissible for this purpose, evidence must have some tendency to establish such fact[48] A suicidal tendency or disposition may be shown in order to create the presumption of suicide, where the testimony shows that death may have been produced by deceased, or there is no positive and direct proof of homicide[49] So evidence is admissible as to decedent's acts or declarations evincing an intention to commit suicide,[50] such as attempts and threats[51] The length of time intervening between the declarations and the death of deceased, according to some authorities, does not affect their competency, but only goes to their weight[52] According to other authorities, decedent's statements of intention to commit suicide, when neither a part of the res gestae nor dying declarations, are inadmissible,[53] and according to still other authorities, the declarations are admissible when made reasonably close to the time of death,[54] and although the trial judge has a wide, he does not have an absolute, discretion to refuse to admit declarations of intended suicide, if he considers them too remote[55] Evidence of isolated facts relative to deceased's financial condition or domestic troubles, not showing a suicidal tendency,[56] or statements made by members of his family to the effect that he committed suicide,[57] are inadmissible It has been held proper to show that deceased was under treatment for nervous disorder or disease,[58] or to show a disordered mental condition,[59] but the latter proposition is denied[60] At any rate, evidence of mental condition, when admitted for the purpose of showing a disposition to commit suicide, should be limited to the fact of such condition and not extend to the cause thereof [61]

A claim or question of suicide in the case will not be presumed in order to find error in the exclusion of the testimony of a witness, who is not a physician, as to a statement by deceased that he was tired of living and indifferent as to life or death [62]

Rebuttal Evidence is admissible to rebut proof of a theory of suicide [63] Where it appears from the evidence that deceased either committed suicide or was murdered, the prosecution may show the absence of any motive for suicide,[64] or that deceased had been apparently healthy and in good spirits,[65] or experiments made with the weapon with which the deed was done repelling the theory of suicide,[66] or expert testimony may be received showing that suicide with the weapon producing death or a similar weapon was improbable,[67] or that the fatal wound could not have been self-inflicted [68] Declarations by deceased while in his last agony,[69] or declarations of accused of an intention to murder a third person at the place and in the manner decedent was killed,[70] are admissible to disprove suicide, but while the acts and declarations of a person claimed to have been predisposed to suicide are competent to prove a contrary state of mind,[71] the acts and declarations admitted for this purpose should be limited to such as fairly tend to prove mental condition [72]

§ 218. —— Incriminating Others in General

Evidence tending to show the commission by another person of the crime charged may be introduced by accused when it is inconsistent with, and raises a reasonable doubt of, his own guilt, but frequently matters offered in evidence for this purpose are so remote and lack such connection with the crime that, in the absence of other evidence disclosing their relevancy or connecting the other person with the crime, they are excluded When admitted, such evidence is subject to rebuttal

Accused is entitled to introduce any legal evidence tending to show that a third person committed the offense with which he is charged [73] This is true where the evidence against accused is circumstantial,[74] and it is also true notwithstanding there is direct evidence tending to connect him with the crime [75] Evidence of another person's guilt offered by accused must be inconsistent with guilt of accused,[76] otherwise it is properly excluded,[77] as where the other, whose guilt is sought to be proved, acted jointly with accused,[78] or where accused admits the killing [79] Evidence to be admissible as tending to show the guilt of a third person need not amount to full proof,[80] or justify his conviction,[81] if it is of a character which may be sufficient to raise a reasonable doubt of accused's guilt,[82] but it must be of a character legitimately tending to establish the guilt of another,[83] and must be confined to substantial facts[84] which are connected with the transaction [85] Evidence which has no further effect than to cast a bare suspicion on another is incompetent and inadmissible[86] The difficulty of determining the relevancy of evidence offered to show that another person committed the crime has been frankly conceded by the courts,[87] and while particular evidence offered for this purpose is sometimes admitted,[88] frequently evidence so offered is excluded, and properly so,[89] because it is irrelevant,[90] or of slight probative value,[91] or would add nothing of consequence to what has been already admitted in evidence and might lead into collateral issues,[92] or because of a lack of other evidence to connect the third person with the crime[93] In the absence of other evidence showing its relevancy, it is improper to admit evidence that deceased had many and indefinite enemies,[94] or had had previous difficulties with a specified third person,[95] or that other unidentified persons had been in the vicinity,[96] or that automobiles were in the vicinity shortly before and after the explosion resulting in the homicide,[97] or that unidentified criminals had been operating in the vicinity,[98] or that a known and admittedly dangerous character had been actually present at the homicide,[99] or that accused and deceased lived in a lawless neighborhood,[1] but, where the relevancy appears from other facts in evidence, it is proper to introduce evidence of enmity shown by specific third persons against deceased,[2] or descriptions of unidentified persons seen near the place and at the time of the homicide[3]

Rebuttal Evidence introduced by accused to prove the commission of the crime by another person may be rebutted by the state or commonwealth[4] To rebut the claim of accused the state may offer proof of the acts and declarations of such other person done and made at or about the time of the homicide, and the circumstances attending them,[5] or proof that such person did not have in his possession the character of weapon with which the deed was done,[6] or that a pistol found in such person's house did not appear to have been recently discharged,[7] or that such person was an accomplice of accused,[8] or that he was not present at the scene of the crime[9] The opinion of accused, stated on cross-examination, that another designated person committed the crime is competent to be considered by the jury on the question of whether accused is attempting to escape responsibility by falsely charging such other person with the crime,[10] but evidence of the opinion of others as to the innocence of the person whom defendant accuses is incompetent,[11] and testimony of a third person, accused by defendant, as to third-degree methods used by the sheriff's office to extort a confession from him, is not admissible on behalf of the state to prove a conspiracy, as to which there is no other evidence, on the part of accused and the sheriff's office to fix the crime on such third person.[12]

Fear and anticipated difficulty The fact that deceased feared a third person,[13] or had anticipated difficulty with him,[14] or the fact that deceased had stated that such third person had threatened to kill him,[15] has been held inadmissible to establish the guilt of such third person.

Flight of third person There are decisions holding broadly that the flight of a third person after the homicide is inadmissible to show his guilt,[16] but evidence of flight has been admitted where the evidence against accused was wholly circumstantial,[17] or where flight was merely corroborative of other facts indicating the guilt of the third person.[18] Although evidence of flight would be considered admissible in a proper situation, there is no error in rejecting it where, at the time it is offered, there is no evidence whatever in the case tending to connect the third person with the homicide and accused does not state to the court that he expects to introduce connecting evidence subsequently, and when the connection is afterward developed, he does not again offer evidence of flight.[19]

Criminal proceedings against another Evidence that another person pleaded guilty and was convicted of the same murder is competent for the purpose of establishing accused's innocence,[20] but it is otherwise where the other person was convicted as an accomplice and accused is charged as a participant.[21] Even an acquittal of the third person after trial does not render evidence of his guilt inadmissible for the defense, and the prosecution may not introduce evidence of the acquittal by way of rebuttal.[22] An indictment against another charging him with the crime,[23] or the record of such indictment,[24] is inadmissible, because foreign to the issue between accused and the state and res inter alios acta.[25] Also, it is improper to show that another was charged with, and arrested for, the crime,[26] or that a complaint was filed against "John Doe" and accused held as a material witness.[27]

§ 219. —— Motive for Others to Commit Crime

Evidence tending to show a motive of another person for committing the homicide may be admissible in connection with other evidence, but not otherwise

One indicted for a homicide may show that another had a motive for committing it,[28] especially where the testimony as to who inflicted the fatal wound is circumstantial,[29] and deceased and accused are shown to have been on friendly terms a short time before the homicide.[30] However, testimony of the isolated fact of motive on the part of another is inadmissible, in order to render evidence of his motive competent, there must be evidence connecting the other person with the homicide,[31] or testimony showing that he was in such proximity

Motive to kill another and mistake in identity

Accused's evidence that another had motive to kill third person and due to mistake in identity killed wrong to the murder as to render the fact of opportunity and motive of weight in determining the identity of the slayer, or in excluding accused [32] Evidence offered to show motive must, of course, have a tendency to do so in order to be admissible [33]

To refute the evidence of motive on the part of another, the state may show that intimate and friendly relations existed between such person and deceased,[34] and where the state offers evidence tending to refute the claim of motive on the part of another, accused is entitled to introduce proof in rebuttal thereof [35]

§ 220. —— Threats, Admissions, and Confessions by Others

Threats, declarations, admissions, or confessions by a third person are not admissible on behalf of accused unless they are part of the res gestae or are links in a chain of evidence connecting with the crime itself

For the purpose of showing that another than accused committed the crime, evidence of disconnected threats and declarations of third persons is inadmissible,[36] but such evidence is admissible where the threats and declarations are part of the res gestae or form links in a chain of evidence connecting with the crime itself [37] A similar rule applies to declarations of a third person that he committed the homicide or procured its commission [38] Where an alleged accomplice claims that he acted under the direction of accused, evidence of threats by the accomplice are admissible on behalf of accused [39] It is not error for the court, after permitting a witness to testify to a threat by a third person to kill deceased, to refuse to permit the witness to go into detail concerning acts and misconduct of deceased as the reason assigned by the third person for his threat [40] Threats and admissions which are not inconsistent with accused's guilt have been held inadmissible in some jurisdictions [41]

§ 221. Character and Habits of Accused

a Proof by accused
b Proof by prosecution

a. Proof by Accused

Accused is entitled to introduce evidence of his general reputation for peace and quiet in the community in which he resides at a time preceding the difficulty which is not too remote, but he is not entitled to show his general character or irrelevant traits of character, or to establish his character by evidence of specific facts and transactions or, in most states, by evidence based on the personal observation, knowledge, or belief of a witness Where the jury will determine the punishment, accused should be allowed, within reasonable limitations, to introduce some evidence as to his early life and environment

In accordance with the rules relating to evidence of the character and reputation of accused in crim-

person but not tending to connect alleged murderer by any overt act with commission of homicide, is properly excluded—Quinn v State, 25 P 2d 711, 55 Okl Cr 116

Motive and threats

(1) Mere evidence of motive in another person or of motive coupled with the threats of such other person is inadmissible, unless coupled with other evidence tending to directly connect such other person with the actual commission of the crime charged

Wash—State v Kwan, 25 P 2d 104, 174 Wash 528

(2) Whether threats of third person are admissible to prove commission of homicide by him generally see infra § 220

Opportunity and motive

Evidence tending to show that a third person in no way connected with the trial, had both an opportunity and motive for committing the crime is not admissible to prove that the homicide was committed by such third person—State v Stewart, 127 S E 260, 189 N C 340

Absence of showing of proximity

In prosecution for negligent homicide, testimony that another admitted he was drunk and might have run over deceased, was properly excluded in absence of showing that third party was in such proximity to offense at time it was committed as would make it reasonably probable that he might have been guilty—Bohannon v State, 273 S W 262, 100 Tex Cr 285

inal prosecutions generally, as considered in Criminal Law §§ 676–679, on a trial for murder it is always competent for accused to introduce evidence showing his general character and reputation in the community in which he resides for being peaceable, quiet, and law-abiding [42] Such evidence is admissible, although the fact of homicide is proved by direct testimony, and does not depend on circumstantial evidence,[43] or although, in the opinion of the trial judge, the guilt of accused is clearly established,[44] or although the defense is insanity[45] or justification,[46] but where accused admits the homicide and claims that the shot was fired accidentally, evidence of good character may be considered only to determine whether the shot was fired accidentally or with premeditated design,[47] and under a plea of insanity it is not competent to show that accused possessed a nervous temperament, or that he was excitable and eccentric [48] On a prosecution for involuntary manslaughter, evidence on behalf of accused as to his good reputation for peace and quiet is inadmissible [49]

Traits of character involved Accused's evidence as to character, it is ordinarily held, should be confined to evidence as to those traits which make it improbable that he would commit the crime charged,[50] such as the traits of peaceableness and quietness,[51] and should not relate merely to general character[52] or to irrelevant traits of character, such as bravery,[53] chastity,[54] industry,[55] integrity,[56] trustworthiness,[57] or truth and veracity [58] Where accused is, or formerly was, an officer, but committed the homicide when acting as a private citizen, it is proper to exclude evidence of his reputation as a diligent and energetic officer [59] Also, it is proper to exclude evidence of the fact of accused's military service,[60] the length of such service,[61] and his excellent conduct as a soldier [62] The general rule is that evidence of the moral character of accused is inadmissible,[63] but there is authority for the view that accused may prove his good moral character as well as his character for peace and quietude [64] Notwithstanding some authority to the contrary,[65] it is generally held that accused is not entitled to introduce evidence of his reputation for honesty [66] Ordinarily, evidence of accused's kindness to his children is inadmissible,[67] but kindness to children may be relevant in a case of infanticide [68]

Manner of proof generally Except in some jurisdictions wherein accused is permitted to show from the personal observation and knowledge of a witness called in his behalf that he possesses those traits of character which would render it unlikely that he committed the offense with which he is charged,[69] the character of accused can be shown only by evidence of his general reputation or reputation in the community,[70] and the personal knowledge and belief of a witness as to the character of accused is not admissible.[71] Evidence of accused's reputation should be confined to the place of his residence or the neighborhood thereof,[72] and to a time preceding the difficulty[73] which is not too remote,[74] but evidence should not be excluded for remoteness where it reasonably tends to show his reputation at such time and place.[75] Evidence of this nature must be directed to accused's reputation or character among those with whom he, and not the witness, associates.[76] Evidence as to particular facts and circumstances is not admissible in chief on the question of character,[77] and even where cross-examination of accused results in proof that he has been prosecuted for a disturbance of the peace, he cannot be permitted to meet it by showing the details of his arrest and the offense.[78] If accused refuses to put his general character in issue, he will not be permitted to prove by his jailer what his character was while confined in prison.[79]

Testimony that accused stood well, except with quarrelsome people, is relevant on redirect examination to rebut testimony on cross-examination as to his quarrelsome reputation.[80]

A proper foundation must, of course, be laid for the admission of evidence as to reputation.[81]

Negative evidence, that is, that the witness has never heard anything against or about accused with respect to his character is admissible to establish his good reputation.[82] In this connection, a question as to whether the witness has ever heard of accused being in any fights has been held proper, it being equivalent to an inquiry as to whether the witness has heard anything against the character of accused for quiet, peace, or good order,[83] but, on the other hand, it is held proper to exclude the testimony of accused's mother on direct examination that he had never previously been in trouble.[84]

Environment or personal history Accused is not permitted to establish his character by proof of the business in which he is or has been engaged,[85] or by introducing testimony as to where he lived during all his life, except during his married life.[86] Where the jury determines the extent of the punishment, accused should be permitted, within reasonable limitations, to state something of his background,[87] such as his environment and hardship during childhood and early manhood,[88] but the trial court fulfills its duty in this respect when it admits testimony relative to the early life of accused and his home surroundings in so far as it is material and relevant [89]

Ownership, use, or carrying of firearms It is not error to exclude evidence, offered by accused, that he was in the habit of carrying a pistol,[90] or that he had a reputation for being cautious in the use of firearms,[91] or, where there is nothing to make it appear material and relevant, evidence of the reason why he carried a revolver [92]

b. Proof by Prosecution

The state may not attack the character of accused, otherwise than for the purpose of impeaching him as a witness, until he has placed it in issue, and even then it may not, except on cross-examination, attack it by evidence of specific acts, but it may introduce evidence otherwise admissible notwithstanding its incidental tendency to discredit or impugn accused's character Under some statutes the bad character of accused may be shown where he applies for a suspension of sentence

Where accused has not placed his character in issue, the state should not be permitted to introduce evidence of his bad character or reputation,[93] even though the evidence against accused is circumstantial [94] Accused by becoming a witness in his own behalf does not place his character in issue as to the particular trait involved in the crime charged,[95] nor does he place it in issue by an irresponsive answer followed by a claim that he can substantiate it by witnesses,[96] nor, where he defends on the ground of a frame-up, by testifying that a witness for the state had procured his arrest on a false charge of vagrancy [97] The impeachment of a witness, including the impeachment of accused in a criminal prosecution who testifies in his own behalf, by an attack on his character is considered in the C J S title Witnesses §§ 491–537, also 70 C J p 820 note 22–p 936 note 8

Evidence otherwise admissible need not be rejected because it incidentally tends to discredit or impugn accused's character,[98] and when accused introduces evidence of his good character the state may oppose it by proper proof that his previous character or reputation was bad [99] The state cannot, primarily or in rebuttal, introduce evidence of specific acts of accused involving the trait of character evidenced by the crime charged,[1] and some courts hold that even on cross-examination of character witnesses the state is limited to evidence of the general reputation of accused,[2] but the more general rule is that the state may on cross-examination properly test the credibility or information of a witness testifying to accused's good character by inquiry as to his knowledge of particular acts of accused involving the trait of character in question[3] Where accused introduces evidence of his good character based on the knowledge of the witness, as distinguished from his reputation, the state is not entitled on cross-examination to inquire as to the witness' knowledge of rumors or reports that accused had committed various other crimes[4] The evidence offered by the state must not be too remote,[5] but remoteness depends on the circumstances of the particular case,[6] and sometimes the objection is considered as going more to the weight than the admissibility of the testimony[7] A charge of, or incarceration for, felony must be shown to have been legal in order that it may be admitted in evidence[8]

Ordinarily, witnesses for the state cannot be permitted to give testimony as to the bad character of accused based on what they heard after the homicide,[9] except in so far as such evidence relates to the reputation of accused as of a time prior to the killing[10] However, where accused files an application for a suspended sentence, the statutes in some jurisdictions specifically authorize proof on the issue of his general reputation to enable the jury to decide intelligently whether to recommend such suspended sentence,[11] and in such case evidence of the general character of accused both before[12] and after[13] the commission of the homicide may be admitted Evidence of prior convictions to aid the jury in determining whether the death penalty should be imposed for the benefit of society should be limited to cases involving professional criminals who are a menace to society and wage war on it for a profit, and to cases of those who commit murder of a cold-blooded and atrocious nature[14] Prior assaults for which accused was not arrested or convicted may not be admitted in evidence to aid the jury in fixing the penalty[15]

In accordance with the foregoing rules, various matters, extraneous to, and disconnected with, the homicide, and effective only to prejudice the jury against accused, have been held not admissible in evidence,[16] while others have been admitted, notwithstanding a claim that their admission constitut-

§ 222. Character and Habits of Person Killed or Assaulted

a In general
b Habits

a. In General

(1) In general
(2) Extent of matters provable and evidence admissible

(1) In General

It is only in certain classes of cases, as where there is some evidence supporting a claim of self-defense, or the evidence of the homicide is entirely circumstantial, or the immediate circumstances of the killing leave the intention of the accused or the justifiableness of his act in doubt, that the accused may show the character of the deceased as having been violent and dangerous and the state may rebut the showing by proof of the deceased's peaceable and law-abiding character

Subject to certain limitations and qualifications hereinafter considered in this section and in § 272, which deals with the admissibility of evidence on the issue of self-defense, evidence as to the character or reputation of the victim of the homicide is inadmissible.[24]

Admissibility on behalf of prosecution Except perhaps where the evidence of the homicide is entirely circumstantial,[25] it is not permissible for the state in the first instance, and before the character of deceased has been assailed, to offer primary evidence or evidence in chief of deceased's good character or reputation as a quiet, peaceable, and law-abiding man.[26] This is true although accused offers evidence of his own good reputation.[27]

Where accused attempts to show that deceased was a violent and dangerous man, the state may properly offer proof of his peaceable and law-abiding character.[28] However, as judicially noted,[29] occasions disconnected with offense charged is irrelevant.—Smith v State, 141 So 265, 25 Ala App 79.

Habit of carelessness may not be shown in a prosecution for manslaughter where there are many eyewitnesses.—People v Crossan, 261 P 531, 87 Cal App 5.

17. Evidence held admissible

(1) There was no irregularity on the part of the state in calling a witness who testified that on night of murder accused came to certain hotel with a woman and rented a room from the witness.—State v Palmer, 288 N W 160, 206 Minn 185.

(2) Question whether accused appeared sober when witness saw him dancing with deceased shortly before homicide, and affirmative answer, were not improper as against contention that question injected into case possibility that accused was a drinking man.—State v Hunter, 48 P 2d 262, 185 Wash 143.

(3) In prosecution for murder with rifle, evidence tending to prove that accused was proud of his skill in use of firearms and disposed to use them in enforcing rights or redressing grievances was admissible.—Farmer v People, 7 P 2d 947, 90 Colo 250.

there is a lack of uniformity in the holdings as to what constitutes an attack on the reputation of deceased so as to make admissible evidence of his good reputation According to some authorities, evidence of general reputation for violent or bad character on the part of deceased is not essential to render admissible evidence of his good character, it being sufficient that the defense shows particular bad traits of character,[30] although accused does not admit that he killed deceased and claim self-defense, his testimony that deceased made an attack on him is a direct attack on the character of deceased for peace and quietude so as to allow the state to introduce evidence of the good reputation of deceased for peace and quietude,[31] and, both under statute and otherwise, if accused undertakes to justify the homicide on the ground of threats made by deceased, the state may prove that the general character of deceased was that of an inoffensive man, and one not reasonably to be expected to execute the threats[32] On the other hand, evidence of threats by deceased,[33] or of specific unlawful acts by him,[34] or of his manner, demeanor, conduct, or statements[35] has been held not to authorize the introduction by the state of evidence of his good character or his good character for peace and quiet Proof that accused had heard of certain conduct of deceased, offered not as justification of the killing but to explain accused's presence, is not a sufficient basis for the admission of the reputation of deceased as to such conduct[36] Evidence which is otherwise admissible as tending to support a theory of the state or commonwealth may be received notwithstanding it may incidentally affect the character of deceased by disproving the fact that he was violating the law, it not being purely character testimony so as to be inadmissible until the character of deceased is attacked[37] It is proper for the state to introduce evidence that there had been no trouble between deceased and another person shortly before the killing to show that rough words spoken by deceased to such person were in jest[38]

Admissibility on behalf of accused Accused should be permitted to show the bad character of deceased or the person assaulted when,[39] and only when,[40] there is proof of circumstances bringing

Necessity of overt act or hostile demonstration at time of killing
(1) In absence of proof of overt act or hostile demonstration at time of killing, evidence of deceased's dangerous character is not admissible —State v Thornhill, 178 So 313 188 La 762—State v Sharpe, 127 So 368, 170 La 69

(2) Evidence that deceased was dangerous, blood-thirsty man is limited in consideration to determine solely meaning of overt act or demonstration of deceased at time of killing —Hembree v State, 110 So 171, 21 Ala App 577, certiorari denied 110 So 172, 215 Ala 246.

the case within an exception to the rule excluding evidence of the character of the victim Aside from the situation where there is a claim of self-defense and some evidence in support thereof, as discussed infra § 272, the violent, turbulent, and dangerous character of deceased may be shown when from the circumstances of the case it is a part of the res gestæ,[41] or it is relevant to illustrate the circumstances attending the homicide,[42] or where deceased was a felon attempting to escape from the custody of accused,[43] or there is evidence of threats by deceased against accused,[44] or when the evidence of the homicide is wholly circumstantial,[45] or where the immediate circumstances of the killing render it doubtful whether the act was justifiable or not,[46] or leave the question of the intention of accused in committing the crime doubtful or the proof evenly balanced,[47] or indicate provocation on the part of deceased[48] In some cases it is held that such character may be shown to enable the jury to determine the degree of the offense and the character and measure of the punishment[49]

(2) Extent of Matters Provable and Evidence Admissible

Ordinarily the inquiry, if any, which may be made as to the character of the deceased must be confined to his general character for violence, ferocity, vindictiveness, or bloodthirstiness, and the evidence admissible to show such character must, except on cross-examination, be limited to evidence of general reputation in the community at the time of the homicide or a time prior thereto which is not too remote

The inquiry as to the character of deceased must relate solely to his general character for violence, ferocity, vindictiveness, or bloodthirstiness[50] The general character,[51] or general moral character,[52] of deceased is not involved, it is held proper to exclude evidence of deceased's general reputation of having had a brutal and cruel disposition[53] or of his general good or bad reputation of having been law-abiding,[54] and it is improper to admit testimony that deceased was the most highly valued deputy sheriff the town ever had[55] It has been both affirmed[56] and denied[57] that accused should be permitted to prove the general reputation of deceased as having been an overbearing man Ordinarily deceased's general reputation in respect of drinking or not drinking intoxicating liquors,[58] or as to having been a rum maker[59] or bootlegger,[60] or the bad reputation of his home for drinking parties,[61] may not be shown, but, where the theory of the state is that the difficulty grew out of a purchase of whisky by deceased from accused, testimony as to whether deceased drank is admissible as tending to show whether deceased would have been likely to have had the whisky transaction with accused.[62] Until it is first established that deceased was a violent and dangerous man, testimony that his character was that of a drug addict is incompetent.[63] Where no statements of deceased are in evidence, it is proper to exclude evidence of his reputation for truth.[64]

(1) Disallowing deceased's wife to testify whether deceased ever used denatured alcohol, and whether deceased drank denatured alcohol on day of homicide, was not error, where accused sought to introduce such testimony to show effect of such alcohol on body of individual who drinks it, and record did not disclose that deceased was dangerous either when sober or intoxicated, or that accused thought that deceased was dangerous. Deceased's kind and monotonous disposition cannot be established by papers or books he may have carried or read. Miller v. State, 71 S.W.2d 516, 126 Tex.Cr. 226.

Reputation evidence of specific facts

It was not error to refuse to allow witnesses to state the general reputation of deceased for being a man who visited and kept on his premises lewd women for immoral purposes, since specific facts cannot be connected in time or occasion with the homicide[71] and are not material or relevant to any phase of the case.[72] It is essential that the witnesses from whom the testimony is elicited shall have, through acquaintance with the people residing in the community,[73] knowledge of the general reputation of deceased[74] and that such reputation shall have been known to accused.[75] While, on the cross-examination of the state's witnesses, accused is entitled to inquire as to their knowledge or information with respect to deceased or other difficulties in which he was engaged, the purpose of such inquiry being to test their credibility or their knowledge of deceased's character,[76] where the witnesses deny any knowledge or information of other difficulties, accused cannot introduce independent evidence thereof and of their notoriety.[77]

b. Habits

Various holdings have been made as to the admissibility, under the issues and circumstances of particular cases, of evidence of certain habits of the deceased

Notwithstanding some authority in favor of the proposition that the fact that decedent's habits were such that he would be apt to do a thing is not competent evidence that he did the act,[78] testimony as to a habit or custom of deceased may, under the circumstances of the case, be competent on behalf of the prosecution[79] or accused.[80] Evidence of deceased's occupation is wholly irrelevant unless there is an adequate explanation of its purpose.[81]

§ 223. Character and Habits of Third Persons

Ordinarily the character, reputation, habit, or custom of third persons is not provable as substantive evidence

Unless there is statutory provision therefor,[91] or some connection[92] which renders it competent, the character or reputation of third persons,[93] as for morals,[94] peace and quiet,[95] or being law-abiding citizens,[96] is not provable as substantive evidence It is held, on the one hand, that accused may not show the good[97] or bad[98] character of a codefendant, and, on the other hand, that accused in a prosecution for murder committed during a robbery, has no ground for objecting to evidence offered by the state that another participant in the robbery and murder, who was killed, had been a former convict,[99] and that, in a prosecution for being accessary after the fact, evidence of the murderer's character and intimacy with accused is competent as bearing on accused's knowledge of the commission of the crime by the murderer and the probability that accused would assist the murderer to escape conviction[1] Accused cannot prove the character of another participant in the fight in which deceased was killed, by showing the circumstances of a previous difficulty between such person and a witness[2] The admissibility of evidence of the character of third persons on the issue of self-defense is discussed infra § 274

Where there is nothing to render an exception to the rule applicable, evidence of the habit of a third person,[3] or of the custom of third persons,[4] is inadmissible

Connecting evidence that third person might have committed homicide Where state relies on circumstantial evidence, and evidence offered by accused that third person might have committed homicide is sufficiently connected in time and by circumstantial evidence to be competent, evidence of moral trait of such third person bearing on whether he would likely have committed offense, is admissible, and in such case the moral trait should ordinarily be shown by witnesses competent to testify to general reputation of such person as to such moral trait.—State v. § 224. Physical Condition of Parties

a In general
b Manner of proof

a. In General

An inquiry into the physical condition and relative size and strength of the persons at the time of the alleged murder or assault with intent to murder ordinarily is proper, but not where it would not aid in determining the guilt or innocence of the accused or in sustaining or rebutting a proper claim or contention

Where death was caused in an affray, the strength and physical condition of deceased and accused at the time may be shown[5] Also, in a prosecution for murder or assault with intent to murder, the relative size and strength of accused and deceased or the injured person ordinarily may be shown[6] and, when shown, may be considered by the jury in determining the degree of the offense,[7] but sometimes evidence of such relative size and strength is irrelevant and without value,[8] and it is admissible in behalf of accused only when the proof establishes a prima facie case of self-defense, or a predicate has been laid therefor by proof that at the time of inflicting the mortal wound accused had been attacked by deceased[9]

Condition of deceased In order to show the relative physical strength or condition of the persons, ordinarily it is proper for the state to establish the victim's age at the time of the alleged crime,[10] his height,[11] the state of his health,[12] and his mental and physical condition immediately after receiving the mortal wound[13] So also the state is entitled to show other facts as to the physical condition of deceased[14] where such facts are relevant as bearing on the question of motive[15] or as contradicting a theory advanced by accused[16] Even though evidence of the poor physical condition of deceased at the time of the difficulty is irrelevant when first introduced by the state, it may be made material by evidence subsequently introduced by accused[17] On the other hand, it is not permissible for the state to prove the health or physical condition of deceased at the time he was killed where such proof would not aid in establishing the guilt of accused or in properly rebutting any defensive theory advanced[18] Evidence that deceased was nearly blind is inadmissible unless accused had knowledge of it[19] A statement by counsel for accused that certain evidence is offered to show that deceased was engaged in hard manual labor is not a sufficient showing of the logical relation between the proposed evidence and the material facts in issue to justify its admission[20]

The state may show that deceased was intoxicated at the time, and unable to make or resist an attack,[21] or, where accused testifies that deceased was drunk, it may show that he was sober when last seen before the homicide,[22] but, in the absence of evidence of intoxication at the time of the difficulty, evidence that deceased had been drinking that day,[23] or that deceased had liquor on that day,[24]

is inadmissible, and the intoxication of deceased is an immaterial inquiry on behalf of accused until the evidence tends to establish self-defense [25]

Condition of accused The size[26] and physical condition[27] of accused at the time of the affray, fatal encounter, or alleged assault with intent to murder is relevant and may be shown, except where there is no issue as to the comparative strength of the parties,[28] or the particular matter offered to be shown is immaterial[29] or would be effective only to prejudice accused with the jury [30] The drunkenness of accused at the time of the alleged offense may be shown,[31] and where there is evidence that he was intoxicated his conduct preceding the homicide may be proved to show his condition [32] While accused should be permitted to testify to his age, a refusal to allow him to do so is not reversible error where he takes the stand as a witness and is therefore observed by the jury [33] Since, in a prosecution for murder claimed to have been committed while deceased was attempting to prevent accused from killing a third person, accused is not being tried for killing or cutting the third person, it is proper to exclude evidence offered by accused that he was suffering from lung trouble and hence was not on an equal footing with the third person unless he resorted to a deadly weapon [34]

Condition of companion of accused An inquiry in respect of the physical weakness of a companion of accused when attacked by deceased and another person is proper [35]

b. Manner of Proof

While an inquiry into the physical condition and relative strength of parties to a homicide should be general and free of unnecessary details or reasons, it should not extend into the realm of speculation or embrace the testimony of nonexpert witnesses as to relative condition or strength. It must be confined to the time of the homicide

Evidence of the physical condition of a party to a homicide must be confined to the time of the homicide [36] The relative physical strength of the parties cannot be proved by evidence of specific acts,[37] or by proof of specific tests of strength [38] The inquiry should be general and without avoidable introduction of irrelevant matter [39] After the main fact of strength or weakness or general condition is established, there is no occasion or excuse for going into reasons or details [40] While the evidence should not be remote and speculative,[41] and a nonexpert witness should not be permitted to state his opinion as to the relative physical condition and strength of the persons,[42] but instead should be asked to state facts as to the relative size, muscular development, activity, and apparent health of the persons,[43] a nonexpert witness may testify that a woman appeared to be[44] or was[45] in "a family way" or as though she "was going to have a baby"[46] It has been held that deceased's health at the time of the killing may be established by his declarations with respect thereto, although made to a

nonexpert witness,[47] but this is denied by other authority where the declarations are not part of the res gestæ[48]

The age of deceased cannot properly be established by the record of his or her marriage[49]

Expert evidence is admissible to show whether a person of accused's physique could inflict a mortal blow with a particular weapon,[50] or whether a person in accused's physical condition could have committed the crime under the circumstances shown without particular physical results[51] Where there is evidence as to the physical and mental condition of accused at the time of the homicide, there is no error in refusing to allow a physician to testify as to how long accused probably will live[52]

§ 225. Surviving Family of Deceased

Ordinarily, on account of its irrelevancy[53] and prejudicial effect,[54] it is not permissible to introduce evidence showing that deceased left a family,[55] the size of the family,[56] that he left children,[57] the number,[58] ages,[59] and poverty[60] of the children, that some of the children are in state institutions,[61] that deceased left a widow,[62] that the widow has an unborn child[63] has left the community,[64] or that deceased was one of several children and that, by their father's death, her mother was left without any means of support[65] Even for the purpose of identifying deceased, it is not permissible to show that he left a widow and a family of children[66] Also, in a prosecution for threatening to kill, it is prejudicial to permit the state to prove that the father of prosecutrix is dead[67] Sometimes, however, the admission of evidence of this nature is held not to be reversible error[68] or the evidence is considered to have some slight bearing on a question of fact arising from a defense presented[69]

the prosecuting witness and accused. However, to be admissible, evidence of prior relations between deceased and accused must relate solely to those previous relations which bear directly on the question of the homicide,[72] it is proper to exclude evidence of prior relations where its materiality is not made to appear,[73] or the particular evidence offered is incompetent[74] or too detailed,[75] or accused offering the evidence has already testified to the mutual good will existing between decedent and himself,[76] and, even if evidence of prior relations offered by accused is admissible, its rejection is not prejudicial where, regardless of the relationship existing between accused and his victim, the homicide was committed under such circumstances that it constituted murder in the first degree.[77] So, under the circumstances of the particular case, it has been held that accused could not show that he and deceased were friendly a year before the killing,[78] or even a short time before the commencement of the fatal difficulty, where it arose from a sudden quarrel,[79] or that the person assaulted made frequent visits to him.[80] The material issue being as to the prisoner's feeling toward deceased, accused is not entitled to show that deceased bore hatred or malice toward him.[81]

Whether accused bought the coffin in which deceased was buried is immaterial and without bearing,[82] but testimony that accused did not visit deceased's body or the scene of the alleged murder and did not attend the funeral is competent to show his real feeling toward deceased at variance with his declared sentiment of close and intimate friendship.[83]

On the inquiry as to the previous relations between the persons it is proper to permit a witness to testify whether those relations were friendly or otherwise, although his statement can be nothing more than an expression of his opinion,[84] yet when it appears that he speaks only from what he has heard one or the other say to himself or to third persons, it is nothing more than hearsay, and should be excluded.[85] The state of feelings between the persons may be shown by proof of the fact that deceased had circulated slanderous reports about accused,[86] but the truth of such reports is immaterial and evidence thereof should be excluded.[87] The nature of the relations between the persons cannot be shown by conduct or declarations of deceased not known to accused at the time of the homicide [88]

(2) Where Deceased or Prosecuting Witness Was Spouse or Paramour of Accused

Within proper limitations, evidence of the previous relations between the accused and the deceased or the prosecuting witness is admissible where the accused is charged with the murder of, or assault with intent to murder, his or her spouse or a person with whom he or she was living unlawfully

Where a man killed his mistress proof of their relations is admissible,[89] and the fact that he is married to another woman may be shown [90] So also, testimony that accused had been unlawfully living with the man she is charged with murdering is relevant and admissible,[91] notwithstanding the natural prejudice against accused arising from such evidence [92] However, where the relation has already been shown, the exclusion of further evidence to show it is not erroneous,[93] and, where the state makes no attempt to show the conduct of accused toward deceased, his mistress, the exclusion of cumulative proof on his part of his kind treatment will not constitute reversible error [94]

Where deceased or prosecuting witness was wife of accused The rule admitting evidence of previous relations applies with peculiar force where a husband is charged with the murder of, or assault with intent to kill, his wife [95] These relations may be shown by proof of quarrels between accused and his deceased wife,[96] and his ill-treatment of her,[97] and proof of his illicit relations and conduct with another woman is competent to show his unpleasant relations with his wife, and his lack of respect and affection for her,[98] but such evidence is not admissible unless it throws light on the motive of accused,[99] or forms part of a chain of facts so intimately connected that the whole must be heard in order to interpret its several parts.[1] Proof of the affection of deceased for accused is inadmissible since is does not show accused's feeling toward deceased,[2] nor can accused show that deceased was bitter and vindictive [3] Testimony that accused complained to his sister about his wife's treatment of him is not admissible under pleas of not guilty and not guilty by reason of insanity [4]

On the issue of accused's relations with the deceased wife, letters of accused to third persons are admissible, where they tend to show his relations with his wife,[5] or with a lewd woman,[6] or that he was engaged to marry another woman,[7] and letters of the wife to a third person, written within a few months of the killing, showing the pleasant and happy relations of her and accused, are admissible on behalf of accused [8] Also the relations of the persons may be shown by proof of the pendency of a suit for divorce brought by the wife against accused,[9] or of their separation,[10] or the issuance of a peace warrant against accused on the complaint of his wife,[11] or a prosecution of accused by deceased for an offense committed upon her,[12] but an interlocutory decree of divorce should not be admitted in evidence for all purposes,[13] as, for example, suggesting to the jury that accused had been guilty of extreme cruelty toward deceased[14]

Accused should be permitted to say whether he loved his wife,[15] and, where the state has shown that there had been trouble between accused and his murdered wife, he should be allowed to prove that he had made up with her[16] Where accused charged his wife with jealousy, he may be cross-examined to show that the wife manifested jealousy only after he became unfaithful[17]

Where the marriage of accused with deceased is disputed, competent evidence is admissible to prove that fact,[18] but, under the circumstances of the particular case, whether deceased was accused's common-law wife may be irrelevant and immaterial[19] Evidence that accused gave deceased certain rings and that she wore those rings on a day prior to the killing is not admissible to establish a contention of the state that accused and deceased were living together as husband and wife[20]

In prosecution of wife for murder of husband it is error to reject evidence offered to show the affection of the wife for the husband,[21] and her testimony, elicited on cross-examination, as to title to property being in her name is competent as tending to negative a reason for the husband wishing to be rid of her as she claims[22] Inadmissible evidence includes Declarations of deceased to a third person concerning misconduct of accused and his intention not to withdraw a divorce suit,[23] evidence that deceased, without the wife's knowledge, made a second will reducing the amount of property left to her,[24] and, where there is no question of self-defense, evidence that deceased abused and mistreated accused[25] It is proper to exclude immaterial evidence, such as statements made by the husband as to his purpose in living with accused,[26] or remote and indefinite testimony calculate to reveal accused's mental state concerning her home life several months preceding the homicide[27]

b. Relation between Accused and Third Person

Ordinarily evidence of the relation between the accused and a third person is irrelevant and inadmissible, but sometimes it is admissible, as in the case of criminal intimacy between the accused and the wife of the deceased

It is proper to exclude, and improper to admit, evidence, irrelevant to any issue in the case, as to the relations between accused and a third person,[28] such as the brother of deceased[29] or the daughter of the person assaulted,[30] but it is not prejudicial to ask accused on cross-examination if he lived with a named woman where the question does not elicit anything improper in his relation with the woman[31] Evidence of the number[32] and ages[33] of accused's children, and his relations with them,[34] is irrelevant and immaterial

Spouse or former spouse of accused The relation between accused and his wife,[35] or between accused and a former spouse or spouses,[36] ordinarily is irrelevant and immaterial, except where accused is charged with the murder of, or assault with intent to murder his or her spouse, as discussed supra subdivision a (2) of this section, but sometimes there is such a connection between such relation and the homicide as to render evidence thereof admissible,[37] and, where accused testifies or introduces evidence on the subject, the state may introduce proper evidence in rebuttal[38] Where accused claims to have killed deceased for insulting his wife, whether or not she was his lawful wife is a pertinent subject of inquiry[39]

Wife of deceased It is proper to question witnesses as to the feeling existing between accused and deceased's wife[40] Evidence as to criminal intimacy between accused and the wife of deceased is competent as showing the relations between them and as bearing on the means and opportunity to commit,[41] as well as the motive for committing, see infra § 230, the offense Accused may, however, show that the relations were proper,[42] or that he did not know of the marriage of deceased[43] Subsequent acts of decedent's widow without the knowledge or acquiescence of accused are not admissible against accused to show that she was in sympathy with accused, or that she had illicit relations with him prior to the homicide[44]

c. Relation between Deceased and Third Person

Sometimes there is a connection which renders evidence of the relation between the deceased and a third person admissible, but ordinarily it is inadmissible

Although it is sometimes held admissible in connection with other evidence[45] or a claim or defense asserted by accused,[46] ordinarily evidence of the relation between deceased and a third person is inadmissible,[47] especially under a defense that accused took no part in, and had no connection with, the killing[48] Accused is not entitled to show the relations between the victim and the brother or brothers of accused[49] or that deceased entertained bad feelings toward his co-conspirator in the homicide[50] Furthermore, a husband charged with the killing of his wife cannot show in extenuation or justification of the act that she was guilty of improper or unchaste conduct with other men,[51] especially when it has not been shown that accused had any knowledge or notice of such conduct,[52] or that the witnesses had any knowledge as to the illicit relations of which they testify, but testify only as to their opinion concerning the character of deceased[53]

Spouse or former spouse In the absence of some connection thereof with the homicide or accused's relations with deceased,[54] evidence of deceased's relations with his spouse,[55] or former spouse,[56] is inadmissible, as is also evidence as to whether deceased and his alleged wife were or were not married,[57] or as to when and where they were married,[58] but evidence of the fact that deceased was married, although not pertinent, may be not prejudicial.[59]

Evidence of difficulties between deceased and his wife is admissible where the homicide resulted from accused's objection to deceased's treatment of the wife,[60] and evidence that the relations between deceased and his wife were pleasant and congenial is admissible to show the falsity of statements to the contrary made by accused after deceased's disappearance.[61] In a case arising out of intimacy between accused and the wife of deceased, separation of deceased and his wife may be shown,[62] but not what occurred between deceased and his wife, before, at the time of, and after their separation.[63]

Wife of accused Where accused did not act under the heat of passion or in self-defense, evidence of illicit relations between his wife and deceased is inadmissible.[64] Also testimony as to accused's wife giving of accused's insurance policies to deceased several months prior to the homicide is immaterial where there is no claim that the fact so enraged accused as to render him incapable of cool reflection.[65] Where accused has offered evidence to the effect that deceased imposed on and mistreated accused's wife, the state is entitled to introduce evidence to the contrary.[66]

d. Relation between Third Persons

Evidence of the relations existing between families or societies of which the accused and the deceased were members may be admissible, but before the relation between persons other than accused and deceased may be shown it must be made to appear that the accused had knowledge thereof and that it has some bearing on an issue in the case.

Evidence of the relations existing between the respective families of deceased and accused is admissible where it will be of assistance in determining one of the issues of the case,[67] but ill feeling between the wives of the parties to a homicide is not a proper subject of proof in the absence of evidence showing that accused had knowledge thereof,[68] and it is error to permit the prosecuting attorney to repeatedly ask witnesses if accused's sister, not produced as a witness, lived in illicit relations with a man.[69] In a prosecution for murder of a brother, it is proper to exclude the will of a grandfather where the will does not mention either deceased or accused.[70]

Evidence of the existence of war, at the time of the homicide, between two Chinese tongs or societies is admissible where accused was a member or partisan of one of the tongs and deceased was a member or partisan of the other tong.[71]

§ 227. Motive

Evidence tending to show the existence of a motive for the commission of the crime charged is admissible in a prosecution for homicide

Although, as appears infra § 318, the state, in a prosecution for homicide, is under no obligation to show a motive for the commission of the crime charged, evidence tending to show the existence of a motive is admissible,[72] this rule being especially which has a legitimate bearing on the question of motive is as a general rule admissible,[78] although remote[79] It must have such a legitimate bearing,[80] but the mere fact that the alleged motive is not correlative to the crime committed does not require the evidence thereof to be excluded,[81] for, although weak and inconclusive in itself, it is a circumstance to be considered in conjunction with others, which tend to implicate accused[82] Inferences based on inferences, however, are not admissible to establish motive,[83] and motive must be proved as a fact and not as hearsay[84] Where evidence for the prosecution as to motive is inconsistent with the theory asserted by the prosecution, it may be excluded[85]

Knowledge of accused It is essential that the facts on which the motive is assigned shall be within the knowledge of the person accused[86]

Evidence not objectionable as proving motive by inference on inference

Where the motive advanced by the state for the homicide was the imminent breaking off by the deceased of her incestuous relationship with accused the admission of evidence to show this relationship was not objectionable as an inference based on an inference, since the testimony, if believed by the jury, had a direct tendency to establish the improper relationship as a fact from which the motive could be legitimately inferred —State v Gaines 258 P 508, 141 Wash 446 rule ordered to show cause why certiorari should not be denied Gaines v State of Washington, 48 S Ct 339, 276 U S 607, 72 L Ed 728, error dismissed and certiorari denied 48 S Ct 468, 277 U S 81, 72 L Ed 793

Prejudicial effect. Evidence otherwise proper as to motive is admissible, although it may be of such a character as incidentally to prejudice the jury against accused [87]

Evidence of other crimes Evidence which has a direct tendency in view of the surrounding circumstances to establish motive is admissible against accused, even though it may tend to show him guilty of crimes other than that for which he is on trial [88] Thus it may be shown that the homicide charged was committed to avoid arrest for another offense [89] It may also be shown that the motive actuating accused for murder of guard in execution of conspiracy to escape, testimony as to previous attempt of accused to escape, although showing attempt to commit crime, was admissible to show motive, notwithstanding accused had not put his character in evidence — Castleberry v State 173 S E 833, 178 Ga 663

Evidence that accused possessed stolen articles is admissible to show motive in a prosecution for the murder of a police officer — Eagles v U S, 25 F 2d 546 58 App D C 122, certiorari denied 48 S Ct 603, 277 U S 609, 72 L Ed 1013

cused in the commission of the crime charged was the concealment of another offense[90] by the destruction of one who had knowledge of such offense, or who had manifested a disposition to acquire information as to the perpetrators thereof[91] Evidence of the pendency of an indictment or information against accused for another crime in which deceased was the prosecutor[92] or a witness[93] is admissible on the question of motive, where it appears that accused knew such fact,[94] but while in such case it is proper to introduce in evidence the affidavit, complaint, indictment, or information,[95] it is not competent to introduce evidence of accused's guilt or innocence of such other crime[96] Also, where accused had a motive for killing a witness in the present case, namely, to prevent his own testimony from being contradicted, evidence of an assault on the witness is admissible[97]

Motive of other participants On the separate trial of one of several persons who acted in concert in the commission of an alleged murder, it is competent for the state to show the motives which actuated the others in the alleged homicide[98] Accordingly, on the trial of an aider and abettor, evidence of any facts tending to show motive on the part of the principal is admissible[99]

Evidence on behalf of accused The state's theory of motive is subject to rebuttal by accused,[2] and he may show acts of deceased or the person assaulted which were known to him and tend to show an innocent motive for his own conduct prior to the alleged offense[3] He is not, however, entitled, under the guise of such rebuttal, to raise immaterial or collateral issues[4] He cannot testify as to secret and uncommunicated motives,[5] but may be required on cross-examination to state his motive or reason for striking the fatal blow[6] Evidence tending to show the existence of a motive on the part of a third person to commit the crime is not admissible in the absence of other evidence connecting such person with the crime,[7] but it has been held that where the state's case is based entirely on circumstantial evidence and the state finds it necessary as a link in the chain of that evidence to trace to accused a motive for the homicide in his previous quarrel with deceased, it is competent for the defense to prove facts showing similar or stronger motives in others to do the same act[8] It is said that absence of apparent motive may always be shown and is a circumstance for the jury to consider[9] On the other hand, evidence tending to show absence of a possible motive of which there is no evidence has been excluded as immaterial[10]

Rebuttal by state. The state may introduce evidence in rebuttal of evidence on behalf of accused of facts tending to show innocent motive[11] and may also offer evidence to rebut accused's claim as to the motive which impelled him to kill deceased.[12]

motive, details of the previous encounter,[23] and the relations of the parties.[24] For example, it may be shown that deceased interfered with or prevented accused's establishing or maintaining improper relations with some person of the opposite sex.[25] The pendency of litigation between accused and deceased,[26] or between deceased and a member of accused's family,[27] or the fact of anticipated litigation[28] may be shown, but the pleadings and orders in the pending proceedings should not be read in evidence,[29] although under certain circumstances, it has been held, this may be done,[30] and evidence touching the merits of the litigation is not admissible in rebuttal.[31]

There must be some link of association between the difficulty or prior ill will and the killing giving color of cause and effect to the transaction.[32]

Remoteness While evidence as to prior difficulties or ill will may be rejected because of remoteness,[33] such objection ordinarily is regarded as affecting the weight and not the admissibility of the evidence,[34] especially when the conditions continue to the time of the homicide.[35]

Bad feeling between third persons is admissible where it shows a motive for the act of accused.[36]

In murder prosecution, complaint and information charging accused with aggravated assault which was committed on deceased about a year prior to murder were admissible as tending to show reason for accused's ill will toward deceased, where judgment showing conviction of simple assault was also offered—Gamez v State, 112 S W 2d 196, 133 Tex Cr 481

Previous criminal complaint

In murder prosecution, a complaint filed prior to homicide charging accused with a simple assault on deceased was admissible, especially where it had been otherwise shown without objection that a complaint had been filed charging accused with assault and that accused had been jailed in connection therewith—Rhodes v State, 126 S W 2d 987, 136 Tex Cr 581

Ravishment of victim's wife

In a prosecution for murder, evidence of the victim's wife that about two years before the tragedy accused had ravished her was admissible as being the cause of the trouble between accused and his victim, the quarrel growing out of the affair never having abated—Spier v State, 248 S W 281, 157 Ark 283

Rebuttal by state

In prosecution for murder, testimony that accused had told deceased's wife that he killed deceased because he had been killing his (accused's) dogs was admissible in rebuttal of accused's claim that he killed deceased for insulting his (accused's) wife—Hughes v State, 262 S W 745, 97 Tex Cr 607

In a prosecution for murder, the admission in evidence of a citation served on accused in an action by deceased against accused for alienation of the affections of deceased's wife was not error where much testimony was offered without objection regarding the improper relations between the wife and accused, and one of the state's theories of motive was that deceased was killed because accused feared a public trial of the issues shown in the citation—Lawrence v State, 18 S W 2d 181, 112 Tex Cr 659

Motive as to third person Where accused by mistake killed decedent when he intended to kill another person, evidence of accused's ill will toward the other person is admissible[37] So the pendency and nature of litigation between accused and a person who was injured by the shot which killed deceased may be shown[38]

Rebuttal by accused Where the state offers proof of quarrels and ill will between accused and deceased, evidence to show a different state of feeling, and that the relations between them were pleasant and agreeable, is admissible[39]

b. Between Husband and Wife

In a prosecution for uxoricide, evidence tending to show that the relations between the accused and the deceased were unpleasant or hostile is admissible on the question of motive.

Where the victim of the crime is the spouse of accused, evidence tending to show that the relations between accused and the victim were unpleasant or hostile is admissible on the question of motive[40] Thus ill treatment, recent acts of personal violence, and threats by accused to kill deceased may be shown as bearing on motive[41] The extent of the inquiry into the relations between accused and deceased is largely within the discretion of the trial court,[42] although care should be exercised to exclude proof of circumstances too remote in time or cause[43] However, evidence of difficulties several years before the homicide has been held not too remote[44] Proof of a quarrel between accused and deceased having no connection with the transaction wherein death resulted is inadmissible unless followed by proof of a continued difference flowing from such quarrel[45] The state may show that the victim had instituted divorce proceedings against accused,[46] or accused against deceased,[47] or the fact

Reason for rule

Evidence of this character tends to repel the presumption of love and affection that arises out of the marital relation, and to establish a motive for the desire to get rid of one who, under normal conditions, would be the natural object of kindness and protection

lapse of time would go to the weight rather than to the admissibility of such testimony.[56] Evidence of accused's illicit relations with other women may be received only when it tends to repel the presumption of the love and affection for his wife that arises out of the marital relation, and to establish a motive for the desire to get rid of her.[57] Evidence tending to disprove the existence of such a motive for committing the crime is admissible for the defense.[58]

§ 230. —— Unlawful Relations with Deceased's Spouse

Evidence of intimate friendship or illicit relations between accused and deceased's spouse is generally admissible to show motive

Evidence of intimate friendship[59] and of illicit relations[60] between accused and the spouse of deceased is admissible to show motive, even, it has been held, where such relations occurred after divorce of deceased and his wife,[61] but as to the latter proposition there is authority to the contrary.[62] Independent acts of adultery, disconnected from other evidence in the case, cannot be shown.[63] The continuance, after the killing, of criminal or undue intimacy which existed before the killing is relevant,[64] but evidence of such intimacy after the homicide, unaccompanied by evidence of previous relations, is generally inadmissible.[65] The commission of rape on decedent's widow immediately after the killing may be shown,[66] but evidence of illicit relations which had existed between accused and the woman who several years later became the wife of deceased is too remote to be admissible.[67] A will, made by the wife of deceased after the homicide in which she left a large portion of her estate to accused is not admissible where no connection therewith on his part appeared.[68] Competent evidence in explanation of the circumstances shown by the prosecution may be introduced by accused.[69]

Evidence held inadmissible

(1) In prosecution for murder of wife, evidence that accused had admitted having once lived with another woman prior to his marriage was inadmissible, where there was no evidence that he had communicated with her for at least five years preceding homicide, and no evidence of disregard of conjugal relations until practically the moment of the homicide.—Brown v. State, 189 N.E. 133, 206 Ind. 223.

(2) In prosecution against wife for killing husband, admitting in evidence isolated instances of wife's meretricious conduct with other men for purpose of showing motive was reversible error.—Adams v. Commonwealth, 120 S.W.2d 237, 274 Ky. 714.—Frisure v. Commonwealth, 53 S.W.2d 204, 245 Ky. 127.

In murder prosecution where theory of state was that accused desired to rid himself of invalid wife to be free to pursue another woman, which theory was pressed on the jury in argument, refusal to permit accused's witnesses to testify to accused's care and ministrations to his wife particularly during her illness, was error.—McClendon v. Evidence properly excluded

In a prosecution for homicide where there was evidence that accused had taken the wife of deceased out in his automobile several times, but always when others were along, so that there was no impropriety, and the evidence showed merely a friendly feeling which accused admitted, it was not error to exclude testimony by the wife of deceased

Evidence is not admissible on behalf of accused of the relation of the wife of deceased with other men [70]

§ 231. —— Jealousy and Unrequited Love

The fact that accused and deceased were rivals for or courting the same woman, or enjoyed her illicit favors, or other facts tending to establish jealousy are admissible to show motive

The fact that accused and deceased were rivals for or courting the same woman[71] or enjoyed her illicit favors,[72] or other facts tending to establish jealousy[73] are admissible to show motive So it may be shown that accused believed that his wife or mistress was being estranged from him by deceased,[74] that his advances were spurned,[75] that deceased terminated an illicit relationship previously existing between herself and accused,[76] or that deceased was an obstacle in the way of accused's marriage [77] Where a man is charged with the murder of his wife or mistress, the prosecution may show that he had discovered or been informed before the killing that she was unfaithful to him,[78] but evidence that accused and deceased frequently visited the same woman is inadmissible in the absence of any showing that accused's motive for the killing was the prevention of deceased's attentions [79] The details of the rival courtship of accused and deceased and the conduct of the parties in particular matters,[80] or the details of a difficulty between accused and a third person of whose attentions to deceased accused was jealous,[81] are not admissible; nor, in a prosecution for assault against a rival with intent to kill, is evidence admissible of hostile acts of accused toward the woman in the absence of the rival [82] Evidence of jealousy shown toward other persons, not connected with the homicide, is not admissible,[83] nor is evidence of jealousy of a wife toward deceased admissible on the trial of her husband for his murder [84] It is essential to prove accused's knowledge of facts relied on to establish jealousy as the motive for the homicide,[85] but such knowledge may be shown by circumstantial evidence [86]

Evidence of threats, made by accused against a woman in an endeavor to persuade her to leave her husband and live with him, is admissible in a prosecution against accused for assault with intent to murder the husband of said woman [87]

§ 232. —— Pecuniary Motive or Hope of Gain in General

Evidence tending to establish a mercenary motive or hope of advantage on the part of accused from the death of deceased is admissible

The prosecution is entitled to show matters tending to establish a mercenary motive or hope of advantage from the death of deceased on the part of accused,[88] as, for example, that deceased was a burden on accused[89] So also the business and social relations between accused and deceased, not only just about the time of the murder, but also for a reasonable time before, are competent evidence as having a direct tendency to show the motive of accused to obtain possession of the property of deceased[90] Even transactions subsequent to the homicide have been held admissible where they are part of a plan to gain a pecuniary advantage from the death of the victim[91]

§ 233. —— Robbery

Where the prosecution's contention is that the homicide was committed for the purpose of robbery, any legitimate evidence tending to establish such fact is admissible.

Where the contention of the prosecution is that the homicide was committed for the purpose of robbery, any legitimate evidence tending to establish such fact is admissible,[93] as, for example, that de-

Evidence of particular facts

(1) Where state relied on theory that wife's motive in killing husband was to obtain undisputed possession of money in savings account deposited in bank under wife's maiden name, admission of evidence of amount of savings account was not error—Britton v State, 70 P 2d 828, 62 Okl Cr 89

(2) In murder prosecution based on the theory that accused and R acted together with purpose of appropriating deceased's property, evidence as to a half interest in deceased's property purchased by R and which he did not pay for, that he took it into his possession after the homicide, and that after the homicide accused claimed to have purchased an interest also, and that a horse which was part of deceased's property was thereafter in possession of accused's relatives, no explanation having been given therefor, was admissible, as were the acts of accused and R relative to the property and to each other—Simpson v State, 264 S W 273, 97 Tex Cr 57

(3) In prosecution of husband for murder of wife permitting witness to testify as to what witness told husband as to wife's intention to get divorce was not error, irrespective of whether wife really had such intention, since such testimony would tend to show husband's fear of losing property by divorce, as motive for murder—Powell v State, 175 So 213, 131 Fla 254

(4) In prosecution for murder, where alleged motive was to obtain preferred stock, in effect a bond, of a corporation of which accused was manager and principal holder of common stock, admitting evidence of insolvency of corporation was proper—State v Uhls, 247 P 1050, 121 Kan 377 rehearing denied 249 P 597 121 Kan 587

Declarations of accused

Testimony that two or three weeks before homicide accused told witness that he was going to have some money, and knew that stingy man had two thousand five hundred dollars, not naming him was competent to show motive, and not too remote—Huddleston v Commonwealth, 64 S W 2d 450, 251 Ky 172

Accused's need for money

In homicide prosecution, testimony that accused gambled, offered to show accused's need for money, and, therefore, the motive for killing was admissible—Moss v People, 18 P 2d 316 92 Colo 88

(2) In prosecution for murder of plant employee, evidence of accused's association with another in commission of series of holdups in vicinity of fatal shooting was admissible as tending to show motive for killing of employee—Cooper v State, 184 S E 716, 182 Ga 42, 104 A L R 1309

Excluding evidence of other motives

Remoteness

Where the state relied on robbery as the motive evidence that deceased in May, preceding the homicide in September, was in possession of a considerable sum of money which he was accustomed to carry on his person was relevant to the issue, and not too remote as to require its exclusion—Lovel v State, 218 S W 319, 93 Tex Cr 615

Knowledge of accused necessary

Where state in seeking to show robbery as motive of homicide relies on proof as to the practice of deceased to carry large sums of money on his person, additional proof of accused's knowledge of such practice is necessary, but such evidence may be circumstantial by showing opportunity to know such practice provided practice thus shown is not too remote in time or place to be relevant to proved opportunity and question of motive—Irwin v State 22 S E 2d 499, 68 Ga App 630

97. Custom

Remoteness

(1) It is proper to prove that deceased had money in his possession shortly before the homicide to show that the motive of the crime was robbery, how far back the inquiry should go being dependent on the character and business habits of deceased and other circumstances which would make it probable that he still had the money at the time of his death and evidence that deceased had money three weeks before his death was therefore admissible on the state's offer to show that it was not his habit to spend much money—State v Long, Del, 123 A 350, 2 W W Harr 380

(2) Evidence showing money in possession of deceased on day before the homicide was admissible as against objection that such evidence was too remote—State v Dorland, 89 P 2d 595, 161 Or 403

Payments made to deceased

ceased is not brought home to accused [2] Testimony that deceased had money of the same character and denomination as that in the possession of accused after the crime has been held relevant [3] It may be shown that accused was endeavoring to ascertain what money deceased had and was purposing to get it by devious ways [4] A previous proposal by accused to undertake a robbery has been held admissible,[5] but evidence of subsequent suggestions by accused as to a bank robbery, not connected with the crime under investigation, has been held inadmissible to show that such crime was committed by him to obtain money [6] Where it is shown that deceased was possessed of a considerable sum, payments by the prisoner before, as well as after, the homicide may be shown [7]

Rebuttal Evidence in rebuttal of the state's theory is admissible for the defense [8] The exclusion of evidence that accused was in comfortable financial circumstances has, however, been held not prejudicial to accused [9] It is not permissible to prove that deceased had no funds at a period long prior to the homicide,[10] and testimony as to the largest sum deceased ever had in a bank is incompetent to disprove the motive of robbery [11] A declaration by accused before the homicide to show his possession of money at that time is inadmissible [12]

§ 234. —— Obtainment of Property by Grant, Devise, or Descent

Evidence that accused was an heir of deceased or believed, although erroneously, that title would be cast to his advantage in the event he survived the victim, and of the forgery of papers vesting property in accused on the death of deceased is admissible on the question of motive

Evidence of the fact that accused was an heir of deceased and would come into the possession of property on his death is admissible as showing a motive for the commission of the crime,[13] and the value of such property known to accused before the homicide,[14] or accused's knowledge or information as to the existence of such property[15] may be shown, but it is error to allow evidence that accused was in indigent circumstances [16] Evidence of accused's belief that the title to property would be cast to his advantage if he survived the owner by reason of his homicidal act, is admissible,[17] even though the belief was erroneous [18] Evidence of a will made by decedent in favor of accused is admissible,[19] provided the latter had knowledge thereof prior to the homicide [20] It may be shown that deceased, to the knowledge of accused, had delivered a deed in escrow to be delivered to a relative of accused at the death of deceased [21] Accused may show in rebuttal declarations of deceased to establish a gift to him of the property of which he was found in possession [22]

The forgery of papers vesting property in accused on the death of decedent may be shown.[23] On a trial for homicide by an accomplice of accused in pursuance of a conspiracy, evidence that a will of deceased, in which accused is named as a residuary legatee and devisee, and in which the accomplice is not named as a beneficiary, is a forgery is material as tending to show absence of motive in the accomplice to commit the murder on his own account [24]

§ 235. —— Obtaining of Proceeds of Life Insurance

Evidence tending to show that accused's motive was to obtain the proceeds of policies of insurance on the life of deceased is admissible even where accused is not the beneficiary if he is shown to have had an interest in the collection of the insurance

Evidence tending to show that the motive of accused was to obtain the proceeds of policies of insurance on the life of deceased is admissible [25] So evidence of the existence of such insurance is admissible,[26] although accused must be shown to have had knowledge thereof[27] before the death of de-

Insurance carried by accused

(1) The fact that accused carried heavy insurance on life of deceased is relevant on question of motive
Tex—Parks v State, 63 S W 2d 301, 124 Tex Cr 405

(2) In prosecution for murder of daughter on whose life accused carried insurance, evidence that accused carried insurance on life of widow whom he had brought to live in his home after death of second wife, and also on life of widow's mother, whose physician had stated that she had come near dying from strychnine poisoning, was competent—State v Smoak, 195 S E 72, 213 N C 79

Insurance applications

(1) In prosecution for murder by poison, wherein accused denied procuring insurance on life of victim payable to himself and contended that insurance was procured by victim, family history of victim which was a part of original application for insurance was admissible—Lambert v State, 174 So 298, 234 Ala 155

(2) In prosecution for murder of accused's wife, insurance agent's testimony that within two years before homicide accused applied for insurance on wife's life was admissible, in view of evidence that accused later obtained through different agent policy on wife's life payable to accused and in force at time of homicide—Beckworth v State, 190 S E 184, 183 Ga 871

(3) Accused's applications for insurance on decedent's life although refused were admissible as showing motive—State v Thomas, 156 S E 169, 159 S C 76

Additional insurance sought by accused

In prosecution of accused for murdering deceased for insurance money by drowning, trial court did not err in admitting evidence that accused had negotiated for additional life insurance on the life of deceased for the purpose of showing motive, where accused had no insurable interest in deceased, and in applying for the insurance made himself the beneficiary and falsely described himself as deceased's nephew Commonwealth v Petrillo, 19 A 2d 288, 341 Pa 209

Evidence of accused's first wife's death from poisoning, and of insurance of her life with accused as beneficiary, was admissible in trial for murder of his second wife, killed and insured in same manner, in order to show his motive—People v Gosden, 56 P 2d 211, 6 Cal 2d 14

Financial condition of accused

(1) In prosecution of beneficiary for murder of insured, evidence that accused was in embarrassed financial circumstances is admissible in some jurisdictions on the question of motive
Tex—Parks v State, 63 S W 2d 301, 124 Tex Cr 405

(2) But in other jurisdictions it has been held that evidence of accused's financial condition is inadmissible—Johnson v State, 57 S E 81, 128 Ga 71

(3) Under the latter rule, however, evidence that accused had procured loans by false pretenses which were settled by payment of insurance proceeds is not inadmissible as relating to accused's financial condition—Williams v State, 170 S E 281, 177 Ga 391

(2) In a prosecution of a wife for murdering her husband insurance policies on his life payable to her and found in her custody were admissible to show motive even though they were not shown to be in force, it not appearing that they were not in force—Williams v State, 119 S E 611, 156 Ga 285

Certificates of group insurance on life of deceased, one of which named accused as beneficiary, were admissible over objection that certificates were not complete contracts without master policy, since statutory rule applied in civil cases where policy constitutes cause of action is not applicable in criminal cases where sole purpose is to show motive—Jones v State, 185 S E 571, 182 Ga 378

cedent[28] Evidence of such knowledge on the part of accused is admissible[29] Where there is evidence tending to show an interest in accused in the collection of insurance payable to another, the existence of such insurance may be shown,[30] but otherwise evidence is not admissible as to insurance on the life of deceased unless accused is the beneficiary or believed himself to be the beneficiary[31] References by accused to insurance on the life of deceased may be shown as indicating his impression or belief and possible motive[32] The payment of premiums by accused[33] and the financial inability of deceased to carry the insurance[34] may be shown It may also be shown that accused made proof of the death shortly after the killing[35] Evidence as to the details of procuring and collecting the proceeds of insurance policies is inadmissible[36]

Where the contention of the prosecution is that accused killed deceased with a view of causing the body of deceased to be mistaken for that of accused, evidence that accused had taken out insurance on his own life payable to a member of his family[37] and that he was in an embarrassed financial condition[38] is admissible on the question of motive.

Rebuttal Competent evidence in rebuttal of the state's theory is admissible for the defense[39] Thus it may be shown in rebuttal that accused knew that the insurance policies were of slight value[40] Evidence of insurance procured by accused in favor of deceased, however, is not admissible in rebuttal of evidence of such motive[41]

34. Evidence of particular facts held admissible

(1) Testimony that deceased lived in a small, meagerly furnished box house and was in very poor circumstances was competent in determining question of conspiracy to murder deceased to collect proceeds of life policy, as tending to show that deceased was not financially able to carry insurance—State v Mansker 98 S W 2d 666, 339 Mo 913

fying accused as the person who did the killing,[43] or of determining whether the blow given deceased was intentional or accidental,[44] or whether accused or deceased was the aggressor on the occasion of the killing,[45] or to show malice, as discussed supra § 206, or motive, as discussed supra § 228 The fact that the threats were made a considerable time before the homicide generally affects their weight and not their admissibility,[46] but it has been held that a threat made a considerable time before the homicide may be inadmissible on the ground of remoteness[47] A threatening anonymous letter not connected with accused is inadmissible[48] Where evidence of threats is admissible, it is proper to give the names of those present when they were made[49]

Evidence of threats is subject to rebuttal by accused by disproving or explaining the threats[50] or by showing reconciliation,[51] but it is not admissible to show in rebuttal that accused is a man of violent passions and in the habit of using threatening language,[52] and it is not error to exclude an explanation which is already in evidence so far as relevant[53] Where accused unequivocally denies threats attributed to him, it is not error to refuse to permit him to state that if he used such expression, he had no reference to deceased[54] The state may in turn reply to accused's evidence in rebuttal[55]

Threats against life of president of United States In a prosecution for knowingly and willfully threatening the life of the president of the United States, evidence of other statements and instances showing the sympathy of accused with the cause of a country with which the United States is at war is admissible to show the willful and serious nature of the threats charged[56]

b. Indefinite, Impersonal, and Conditional Threats

Indefinite, impersonal, and conditional threats are admissible when they are shown to refer to the deceased

A threat to kill or injure someone, not definitely designated, is admissible in evidence[57] when other facts adduced give individuation to it so that, as it is generally held, the jury may infer that they were made against deceased,[58] but there is authority requiring it to appear to a reasonable certainty that accused directed the threat against deceased, and holding, if the evidence leaves that matter in doubt, that the doubt must be resolved in accused's favor and the threat excluded.[59] General threats not shown to have any reference to deceased cannot be proved.[60] Words uttered under such circumstances as prima facie to import a threat are admissible.[61] The fact that the threat made was conditional[62] or was immediately retracted[63] does not affect its admissibility, and the meaning of a condition may be shown, if it does not appear from the bare language of the threat.[64] Evidence is admissible to show that threats not naming any person applied to deceased,[65] but the opinion of a witness that threats were directed against deceased is inadmissible.[66]

c. Threats against Class

Threats made by the accused against a class to which the victim belonged are admissible

Threats made by accused against a class to which deceased belonged, and prima facie referable to deceased, although his name is not mentioned, are admissible against accused.[67] Thus threats against peace officers,[68] persons of a certain nationality,[69] the members of a family,[70] or any persons visiting a certain woman[71] are admissible, where deceased was a member of the class referred to.

§ 237. Threats by Person Killed or Assaulted

In general, threats by the deceased against the accused, unaccompanied by overt acts or not made as part of the res gestæ, are inadmissible

Ordinarily, in the absence of overt acts, threats on the part of deceased against accused[72] or threats of a general nature[73] are inadmissible, but threats by deceased against accused are admissible as part of the res gestæ when they were made at the time of the act which they are supposed to characterize, and so harmonize with it as to constitute one transaction,[74] provided such threats refer to accused.[75] Whether such threats were communicated to accused,[76] or whether the threats were seriously made or not, if deceased did that which justified a reasonable belief on accused's part that deceased intended to execute the threats,[77] is immaterial. Such threats are also in explanation of a statement of accused, shown by the prosecution, that he would have to kill deceased.[78] It has also been held that where the evidence of the killing is wholly circumstantial, threats of deceased, even if unknown to accused, are admissible in evidence as tending to show the inherent probabilities of the transaction irrespective of any question of self-defense.[79] Threats of deceased may also be admissible to show who was the aggressor,[80] or to show motive,[81] state of mind,[82] or malice, as considered supra § 207 The prosecution may introduce evidence tending to explain threats made by deceased in a manner inconsistent with the color placed thereon by the testimony for accused[83] A vague letter of warning not traced to deceased is inadmissible[84]

§ 238. Threats by or against Third Person

Under certain circumstances threats by or against third persons may be admissible

As a general rule, threats made by accused to kill or injure one person are not admissible in evidence on an indictment charging the murder of another person[85] Such threats are not admissible under circumstances which show no connection with the injury inflicted on deceased,[86] but they are admissible where a sufficient connection is shown[87] or where they are necessarily shown in proving threats against deceased[88]

Threats by deceased against a third person usually are inadmissible[89]

Threats by third persons As appears supra § 220, threats by third persons against deceased are admissible on behalf of accused within certain limitations to show that such third person, and not accused, committed the crime Where the existence of a conspiracy is proved, threats of the co-conspirators with accused are admissible within proper limits[90] Threats made in the presence of accused against deceased may be proved[91] Threats with which accused is not connected and of which he is not shown to have had knowledge are inadmissible[92] Threats by third persons against accused usually are inadmissible,[93] particularly when it does not appear that he knew of them[94] Such threats against accused are inadmissible to show a conspiracy against him as far as deceased was concerned[95]

§ 239. Preparations and Previous Attempts

Evidence tending to show preparation by the accused for the crime or previous attempts by him to kill deceased is admissible

Evidence tending to show preparation by accused for the crime is admissible[96] So a conversation between accused and another tending to show that at the time of the conversation accused contemplated the commission of the crime is admissible,[97] if the time of such conversation is not too remote[98] So also it is usually proper to show that shortly before the killing accused purchased, borrowed, or otherwise possessed himself of the means of committing the crime,[99] or endeavored to make such prepara-

Effect of admissions by state

Evidence of uncommunicated threats by deceased to kill accused cannot be excluded, when offered to show an intention from which it might be inferred that deceased was the aggressor because the prosecution fails to dispute or even concedes, that deceased attempted to kill accused, as this does not show who the aggressor was, and, moreover, accused is entitled to prove his defense in his own way —Commonwealth v Santos, 119 A 596, 275 Pa 515

tion,[1] or obtained information as to how the crime might be committed in the manner in which it apparently was thereafter committed,[2] but the means procured by accused must be sufficiently identified with the means actually employed[3] It is not permissible, when the means of causing death are known, to show that accused procured weapons not so used,[4] and evidence of preparation not connected with accused is inadmissible[5]

Accused ordinarily is permitted to show why he happened to be armed with the weapon with which the crime was committed,[6] or why he happened to purchase poison of the kind which caused deceased's death[7] He is not, however, in some jurisdictions allowed to testify as to his secret motive or purpose,[8] and it has been held that it is not relevant to show that he armed himself because of feeling arising from quarrels with a person other than deceased[9] So also in some states he is entitled to prove remarks made by him at the time the weapon was purchased,[10] while in others he is not[11] Evidence tending to show preparations by accused, before the homicide, for flight is admissible[12]

the conduct or actions of deceased[17] or the person assaulted,[18] even though such facts do not constitute a part of the res gestæ[19] When accused denies that he killed deceased, evidence of antecedent circumstances legitimately tending to connect him with the homicide is admissible[20] Evidence of the conduct of accused shortly before the homicide indicating that he was in a reckless or vicious humor and desired trouble is admissible,[21] and the prosecution may also show that accused was armed at the time of such conduct[22] Evidence is admissible of antecedent circumstances which tend to throw light on the difficulty in which the homicide or assault occurred,[23] or to show the circumstances under which the killing occurred[24] For example, where the homicide was the result of an altercation the entire transaction leading up to the killing is admissible in evidence against accused[25] Evidence of matters occurring before the killing may be admitted to show the manner in which the crime was committed,[26] even though, it is said, accused is not identified in connection therewith[27]

In order to be admissible, evidence of prior occurrences must be such as to connect accused therewith,[31] and evidence of criminating acts of one not sufficiently identified as accused has been held inadmissible[32]

Relevancy in connection with other evidence Evidence of antecedent circumstances which is explanatory of,[33] or corroborative of, disputed evidence,[34] or which rebuts evidence previously introduced by the other side,[35] as a general rule is admissible When part of an antecedent conversation, or part of a transaction, is put in evidence, the opposing party is entitled to introduce or to enquire into other parts or the whole thereof[36] Where accused has treated certain acts and declarations as though they were in fact the acts and declarations of a certain person, such acts and declarations may be introduced in evidence against accused and treated as the acts and declarations of such person, if they would be competent evidence, and if they were in fact his acts and declarations, unless the contrary is shown[37]

b. Circumstances of Conspiracy or Concerted Action

The acts and declarations of one conspirator during the existence of the conspiracy and in furtherance thereof is admissible against the other conspirators

Where a third person has apparently acted with accused in the transaction which culminated in the homicide, the acts and declarations of such third person shortly before the homicide in the furtherance of the conspiracy are competent,[38] even though done or made in accused's absence[39] In making proof of such a conspiracy, the evidence takes a wide range[40] Any fact or circumstance, either

direct or circumstantial, tending to establish a concurring agreement to carry into effect a common purpose to commit the homicide is relevant[41] On the other hand, evidence of antecedent circumstances and declarations tending to rebut the showing of a conspiracy is relevant on behalf of accused[42] Where there is no evidence of a conspiracy, it is error to permit a witness to testify that accused and another purchased cartridges of him the day before the killing, and not to permit the other to explain how he came to be with accused,[43] or to permit a witness to testify that he took a shotgun from one place to another previous to the homicide[44] In the absence of conspiracy a witness should not be permitted to testify respecting the purpose of witness or accused in going together to a place where they expected to see deceased[45] Evidence as to the members composing a mob is material only in connection with other evidence that accused was one of the party[46]

§ 241. —— Previous Difficulties

Competent evidence of prior difficulties which is relevant to the issues is admissible on behalf of the prosecution

Evidence of quarrels or difficulties prior to the killing or assault, and out of which it might have resulted, is admissible on behalf of the prosecution,[47] although they may have occurred long previously,[48] provided the evidence shows that the disagreeable conditions continued to the time of the killing.[49] Evidence of previous difficulties between accused and persons other than deceased is admissible where there is a direct connection between the facts sought to be proved and the homicide,[50] or assault with intent to kill.[51] Proof of a quarrel between one who acted with accused and a third person whom the former was attempting to kill when he killed deceased is admissible.[52] On the other hand, evidence of a difficulty or fight between deceased and accused which occurred some time before the homicide and is not connected therewith,[53] or of a previous difficulty between accused and a third person with which deceased had no connection, and which was not a part of the transaction in which deceased was killed,[54] or of a difficulty between deceased or person assaulted and others than accused having no connection with the fatal difficulty,[55] or with which accused is not shown to have had any connection,[56] or of a difficulty between two third persons with which accused is not shown to have been connected,[57] is inadmissible.

As a general rule accused will not be permitted to introduce evidence of previous quarrels and difficulties,[58] although such evidence may be admissible if constituting a part of the res gestæ[59] or within proper limitations on the issue of self-defense, as considered infra § 275. Proof that deceased had been guilty of acts of violence to third persons of which accused had been informed is inadmissible.[60] On the other hand evidence having a tendency to show that accused was seeking to avoid further difficulty should be admitted.[61]

The details and merits of a former difficulty, however, cannot be inquired into,[62] further than to shed light on the question as to who was the aggressor

In a prosecution for assault on O with intent to commit murder where accused had testified regarding a previous altercation with O, it was error to exclude testimony of disinterested witnesses regarding this altercation, since it was admissible to show accused's state of mind and his relation with O and enable the jury to determine whether his action was influenced by fear, malice, or done in heat of passion.—People v Dugas, 141 N E 769, 310 Ill 291.

explain or reconcile his conduct,[69] whether they are part of the res gestæ or not,[70] especially where the case depends on circumstantial evidence.[71] If such declarations and the homicide form parts of one continuous transaction, the declarations are admissible, although not shown to have any immediate connection with the crime.[72] As discussed supra § 236, threats of accused against the life of deceased are admissible within proper limits. Mere predictions of trouble not amounting to threats are held inadmissible,[73] but evidence that accused on several occasions had used language expressing hostility to, and dislike of, deceased has been held admissible, although the language proved did not amount to threats,[74] and it is not necessary to lay a foundation for such evidence by asking accused whether he made the statements.[75] On the other hand, statements of accused which do not form a part of the res gestæ of the crime and which do not tend to prove or disprove any matter in issue are not admissible,[76] particularly where they merely tend to damage him in the estimation of the jury.[77]

When the declaration or conversation is given in evidence, any other declaration which is necessary to make it fully understood or to explain it may also be given in evidence.[78]

Declarations of accused some time before the homicide and not connected with the transaction in which the killing occurred, but amounting merely to statements in his own favor, are not part of the res gestæ and are not admissible on his behalf,[79]

(3) Testimony as to declarations of deceased with respect to abortion operation was admissible on ground that they were statements made in furtherance of a criminal conspiracy and were evidence against others engaged with deceased in such conspiracy—Kraut v State, 280 N W 327 228 Wis 386

(4) Accused may prove that the alleged victim declared that she came to him to be treated for a condition resulting from an operation for abortion already performed by some other person—People v Berg 274 P 433 96 Cal App 430

(5) It has been held, however, that accused could not show what the victim told him of her condition and symptoms—Commonwealth v Morris, 162 N E 362 264 Mass 314

(6) Exclusion of testimony as to contents of statement signed by deceased on entering accused's hospital was held not to be erroneous—People v Rongetti, 163 N E 373, 331 Ill 581

(7) Any statement by deceased of her intention to have a criminal abortion performed by accused cannot prove the actual performance of such an operation by him—Clark v People, 86 P 2d 257, 103 Colo 371

(8) Statement of deceased before operation indicating only that she had consulted physician other than accused was properly excluded for lack of relevancy—State v French, 210 N W 45, 168 Minn 341

(9) Statement made by deceased before her death that she had taken medicine more than week before visiting accused was held not to be ad-prosecution for assault with intent to murder,[84] particularly where they were made in the presence of accused.[85] Where the fact that deceased made a statement is relevant, the fact that the statement was made is admissible.[86] Where deceased's intention is material, his declarations as to his intentions are relevant,[87] and his declarations are likewise admissible to explain his conduct and motive where such is relevant.[88] A declaration by deceased indicating a present intention to do a particular act in the immediate future, made in apparent good faith and not for self-serving purposes, has been held to be admissible to prove that the act was in fact performed,[89] and to explain deceased's conduct.[90] Evidence explanatory of statements in evidence may be admitted.[91]

c. Of Third Persons

As a general rule, declarations of third persons, not constituting a part of the res gestae, are not admissible unless they fall within some exception to the hearsay rule

Generally declarations of third persons not part of the res gestæ are mere hearsay and are not admissible.[92] Declarations of third persons before the homicide may be admitted if so connected with the transaction as to form part of the res gestæ,[93] or when made in the presence of accused or brought to his knowledge before the killing,[94] and the state missible as showing that deceased was not pregnant at time of visit—People v Coltrin, 55 P.2d 1161, 5 Cal.2d 649.

a. Physical Conditions

(1) In general
(2) Condition and location of body; wounds and marks

(1) In General

Evidence of physical facts and conditions observed after the crime and connected therewith, and tending to establish the accused's guilt or innocence, is admissible This rule has been applied to such matters as the condition of the place of the crime, the finding of articles, and the presence of blood or bloodstains on clothing or elsewhere

Evidence of physical facts observed after the homicide or assault with intent to kill or murder and connected therewith, and tending to establish the guilt or innocence of the accused, is admissible,[58] but evidence of disconnected facts is not admissible [59] Under this general rule evidence is ad-

Lapse of time; remoteness

(1) Lapse of a week before finding of bullet holes held not to render evidence inadmissible for remoteness — Houston v State, 264 S W 869, 165 Ark 294

(2) Lapse of three months after shooting before finding of bullet, goes merely to weight and not to admissibility of evidence — Bates v Commonwealth, 276 S W 119, 210 Ky 421

(3) Where but one shot had been fired and that was fired by accused with a shotgun, testimony that three shotgun wads were found a few yards from the front door of victim's home was not inadmissible although the wads were found twelve or fifteen hours after the alleged shooting objection going more to weight of evidence than to admissibility —McElroy v State, 115 S W 2d 971, 134 Tex Cr 415

(4) That hair similar to that of deceased who was alleged to have been beaten to death with a blunt instrument, was not discovered on accused's shovel until several months after shovel had come into possession of authorities went only to weight and not to admissibility of evidence —State v Rowe, 280 N W 646, 203 Minn 172

(5) Where deputy sheriff produced in court a bush which had been

missible as to the condition of the place of the alleged homicide,[60] or of the place where the body was found,[61] the finding of articles,[62] including articles belonging to accused[63] or a codefendant,[64] footprints or tracks,[65] the mark of a shot,[66] or bullet holes,[67] and as to physical conditions generally as the witness found them.[68] It is proper to show growing near the spot where deceased was shot, several months after the shooting, and the bush indicated that it had been struck by something, but deputy was unable to say it had been struck by a shot, court did not err in permitting him to testify as to location of bush as tending to refute accused's version as to where accused stood at time of shooting, the lapse of time affecting the weight to be given the testimony rather than its admissibility—Salyers v. Condition after interval; change of condition

(1) Competency of evidence as to condition, number of days after killing of objects surrounding the scene of killing depends on whether it is shown with reasonable certainty or whether the jury may infer with certainty that conditions were same as at time of or immediately after killing.—Houston v. State, 264 S.W. 869, 165 Ark. 294

(2) Where shooting took place on rarely traveled road, testimony as to condition of ground on day following murder was admissible—Adcock v. State, 20 S.W.2d 120, 179 Ark. 1055

(3) Testimony as to powder burns on door facing was not competent without proof that it was in same condition as just after shooting—Meek v. Commonwealth, 11 S.W.2d 996, 227 Ky. 83

(4) Evidence of condition and surroundings of isolated cabin, to which none but accused had access since time of killing therein, when premises were examined about seven months later, held properly received, without preliminary showing that conditions were same as at time of killing—State v. Leib, 201 N.W. 29, 198 Iowa 1315

(5) It was not error to admit evidence of the condition of a room in which the homicide occurred, about two months thereafter, where it was shown that the room was in substantially the same condition as when the difficulty occurred—State v. Chacon, 209 P. 889, 36 Idaho 118

the physical condition of accused[69] or his codefendant[70] soon after the homicide, or of deceased after the fatal blow and before death resulted,[71] or of the person assaulted, soon after the event[72] So also it is proper to show the condition of the clothing of accused[73] or his codefendant[74] after the crime, or of deceased when he was found,[75] or the appearance of the clothing worn by deceased at the time of the fatal difficulty,[76] or the place where the clothing of deceased was found[77] Testimony as to a search of accused made at his instance, in which no knife or weapon of any kind was found, is admissible[78]

Blood, bloodstains It is proper to show the presence of blood or bloodstains on the person, clothing, or possessions of accused[79] or his codefendant,[80] or another person involved,[81] or on the clothing of deceased,[82] or at the place of the crime,[83] or at a place where the evidence tends to show accused has been since the crime,[84] or to show bloodstains as tending to show where the crime was committed[85] Evidence as to bloodstained articles in possession of the state may, however, be excluded, when the articles themselves are not produced, and their nonproduction is not explained[86]

Condition of weapon Evidence is admissible as to the condition, after the crime, of the weapon with which the killing was done, or the assault made,[87] or of the weapon carried by deceased,[88] or of a weapon taken from accused after the homicide[89]

Expert and opinion evidence Subject to the rules governing the use of expert and opinion evidence in criminal prosecutions generally, see Criminal Law §§ 858–891, a duly qualified expert may express his opinion bearing on the physical conditions surrounding the homicide where it is as to a matter within his special skill and knowledge,[90] and generally the opinion of a nonexpert witness may be received as to those facts as to which judgment or opinion is all that can be expressed,[91] but expert or opinion evidence is not admissible as to matters concerning which the jury are as competent to form an opinion as the witnesses may be, and such facts should be established and the jury left to form their own opinion [92] A witness, although not an expert, may testify as to the condition in which the victim was found shortly after the assault [93] Where a witness has testified as to certain matters which a particular scientific test is essential to determine and then testifies that he did not make such test, his conclusion should be stricken out [94]

(2) Condition and Location of Body, Wounds and Marks

Details with respect to the condition and location of the body of the deceased or the assaulted person may be shown by proper evidence, and expert and opinion evidence may, subject to general rules, be admitted for this purpose

It is proper to show the condition of the body of deceased or the assaulted person when found,[95] or thereafter,[96] its location[97] and position,[98] the existence of wounds,[99] their nature,[1] location,[2] cause,[3] appearance,[4] and result,[5] the existence and location of bruises,[6] or the presence of blood on deceased's body [7] Evidence of the condition of the body of deceased in a certain particular which has no tendency to connect accused with the crime, but tends to throw prejudice on accused, should be rejected [8]

Where accused contends that his wounds were received in the fatal difficulty, evidence as to his having received them otherwise is admissible [9]

Expert and opinion evidence Subject to the rules as to expert and opinion evidence generally, as discussed in Criminal Law §§ 858-891, a properly qualified witness may be permitted to testify as to the significance of wounds,[10] their probable result,[11] the character of instrument with which they were made,[12] the direction from which a blow inflicting them was delivered[13] and its force.[14] the point of entry and departure of a bullet[15] and the course which a shot took,[16] the marks of powder burns,[17] or that bruises were caused by a blow of the fist,[18] but the opinion of a witness is not admissible where the facts necessary for its foundation are not in evidence,[19] and where the appearance of a wound has changed before it has been observed by the expert, he cannot testify as to the point of entry and departure of a bullet.[20] According to one view, the question whether a wound is such as might be self-inflicted is not a proper matter of expert or opinion evidence,[21] but it has been held that an expert may testify as to such fact.[22]

A nonexpert witness may describe a wound which he has seen,[23] the angle of a shot,[24] or the course or range of the wound,[25] and witnesses who are not experts in the strict sense may testify as to their conclusions of fact, such as are drawn by men in their ordinary affairs of life.[26] Where the wound received by decedent necessitated the amputation of his leg, evidence of a nonexpert witness as to the appearance of the leg just before the death of deceased is admissible.[27] Where the homicide was of a newly born infant, a nonexpert witness, after testifying that he observed a red mark upon the infant's lip and also other marks on the lips and chin, may state his opinion that the child had the appearance of being smothered.[28] A nonexpert cannot testify as to how long deceased had been dead when witness saw him.[29] A witness has been held not entitled to give his opinion that wounds on the bodies of two persons killed at the same time and place and in the same fight were inflicted by the same instrument.[30]

b. Mental Conditions

Evidence of the accused's mental condition after the homicide is admissible.

Evidence of the mental condition of accused after the homicide, such as his nervousness[31] or coolness,[32] is admissible.[33]

Evidence of the mental condition of the person who did the killing for which accused is charged as an accomplice, showing that such person could be influenced, is not admissible.[34] A witness cannot testify as to the mental condition of decedent as a matter of conjecture from the observed or imagined condition, appearance, movements, conduct, and demeanor of decedent after a meeting between decedent and accused.[35]

Evidence as to the state of mind of accused's wife after the commission of the offense has been declared irrelevant.[36]

§ 249. —— Possession of Weapons and Other Objects

Evidence of the accused's possession, after the crime, of a weapon similar to that used, or of other objects tending to show his guilt, is admissible under a number of authorities, but others reject such evidence where connection of the weapon with the crime is not shown, and evidence of the finding of weapons and objects not shown to be connected with the accused is inadmissible.

Evidence is admissible to show that after the homicide or assault with intent to kill or murder accused had in his possession a weapon similar to that with which the killing was done or the assault made,[37] or that such a weapon was found on his

A jailer's testimony that accused was "scared to death" when taken to jail on night of homicide was admissible to show that accused knew he had committed offense against law, and probably recognized enormity thereof in contravention of his testimony that he had no knowledge or recollection of what he did.—Kelley v. premises[38] or in a place where he was after the homicide,[39] and circumstances tending to connect a weapon found in accused's possession with the homicide are admissible.[40] Failure of the prosecution to identify the weapon as the one used has been held not to render the admission of the evidence erroneous,[41] but it has been held, on the other hand, that evidence of possession of a weapon or weapons other than that with which the crime was committed and having no connection with the homicide,[42] or the finding of a weapon not traced to the possession of accused or shown to be connected with him in any way,[43] is inadmissible. The mere fact that accused carried a weapon after the offense has been held inadmissible,[44] particularly where such possession was after the lapse of a considerable period,[45] but other authority is opposed.[46]

Evidence of the finding of other objects apparently employed in the commission of the homicide,[47] or of accused's possession of, or access to, other objects tending to show his guilt,[48] is admissible, but the finding of objects in the house of another, without a showing that accused was connected in any way either with the house or with such other person, is inadmissible.[49]

Accused, on his part, should be allowed to explain his possession of such objects.[50] He may also rebut evidence tending to trace to his possession the weapon with which the killing was done.[51]

Possession by deceased. Where accused testified that deceased attacked him with a weapon, testimony that no such weapon was found on deceased's person after the difficulty is admissible, in the absence of a showing of change in the surrounding conditions.[52]

The possession of a weapon by a witness at the trial, when he demanded that accused surrender his weapon, is immaterial.[53]

§ 250. —— Possession of Money or Property of Deceased

It may be shown that after a homicide the accused had money or property belonging to the deceased, or similar property, particularly where robbery is also charged, and the accused's apparent acquisition of funds at the time of the homicide is relevant and material, even without identification of the funds as those of the deceased

It is competent to introduce in evidence the fact that, after the killing, accused had possession of property belonging to deceased,[54] particularly where it is claimed that deceased was robbed as well as murdered,[55] or of property similar to that which deceased had and of which he was robbed,[56] and evidence tending to identify such property as that of deceased is admissible.[57] It may also be shown that accused had possession of money of a kind and denomination similar to that which deceased was known to have had,[58] and where accused had no money before the murder, but had money afterward, it may be shown that deceased had money of a similar kind and denomination which was not found on his body.[59] Facts showing an apparent acquisition of funds by accused at the time of the homicide are relevant and material,[60] even though there is no identification of the funds as those of deceased,[61] and even evidence as to the amount and kind of money found in the possession of accused's wife has been held admissible to show that robbery was the motive.[62]

The finding of property of deceased at a place where defendants have been since the homicide may be proved,[63] provided there is evidence connecting defendants with the placing of the articles in such place.[64]

Accused's evidence in explanation of his possession of property of deceased may be rebutted by competent evidence on behalf of the prosecution.[65]

Effect of lapse of time There is no rule prescribing a time beyond which the possession of property taken from a murdered man ceases to be evidence of guilt, lapse of time does not render the evidence incompetent, but simply goes to its cogency as proof of guilt.[66]

§ 251. —— Flight, Avoidance of Arrest, Concealment, and Escape

Evidence of the accused's flight, or attempted flight, after the homicide or assault generally is admissible even where he admits the commission of the crime, and his resistance to, or attempt to avoid, arrest, or attempt to escape after arrest, may be shown. He should be allowed to account for or explain his flight or to refute testimony as to it, but if the state makes no attempt to show flight he may not prove that he did not flee or conceal himself, or that he voluntarily surrendered himself.

Evidence of the flight, or attempted flight, of accused after the homicide or assault with intent to kill or murder is admissible, as this tends to show his state of mind and indicates a consciousness of guilt,[67] and the incidents or details of the flight

may be shown when relevant.[68] Even where accused admits the commission of the homicide or assault, it has been held that evidence of flight is admissible in connection with other circumstances and facts immediately connected with the homicide, to enable the jury to determine the condition of accused's mind at the time of flight,[69] and the degree of the crime.[70] This rule has been applied where the defense was accident,[71] insanity,[72] or self-defense;[73] on the other hand it has been held that, where the only question at issue is whether the killing by accused was justified, evidence of flight is not relevant.[74]

The evidence offered, to be admissible, must have some tendency to show flight.[75]

Evidence of accused's resistance to arrest,[76] evasion of arrest,[77] attempt to conceal himself[78] or his identity,[79] preparation for escape,[80] or attempt to escape after he was arrested[81] is admissible. There is, however, authority denying the admissibility of evidence of accused's forfeiture of his bail bond and evasion of arrest thereafter.[82] Evidence as to the manner of accused's escape from jail is admissible.[83]

Accused should be allowed to explain or account for his flight or concealment,[84] or the appearance or implication of flight,[85] as by showing his apprehension of violence at the hands of persons likely to attack him,[86] or to refute testimony as to flight[87] However, it has been held that, where it is clearly proved that accused struck the fatal blow, he cannot complain that his explanation of his motive in running away was not received in evidence,[88] and statements of accused, not part of the res gestæ, made to persons having nothing to do with the case, a considerable time after flight, and before arrest, are not admissible[89] The evidence offered to account for flight must be relevant[90] Uncommunicated plans of accused are not admissible to explain flight,[91] and the advice of an attorney cannot be shown to explain accused's absence from the state[92] The prosecution may offer evidence to weaken accused's explanation of his flight[93]

Where the prosecution relies on certain matters to show flight and evasion of arrest, accused may show that he was ready to surrender[94] or did surrender[95] Where the prosecution offers no evidence, or makes no contention, of flight, accused is not entitled to prove that he did not flee,[96] or to explain his flight,[97] or to prove that he did not give trouble to the officer who arrested him,[98] or that he voluntarily surrendered himself,[99] or did not attempt to escape or conceal himself.[1]

a. Of accused
b Of victim
c Of third persons

a. Of Accused

Declarations made by the accused after the homicide or assault and constituting part of the res gestæ may be proved, and even if not part of the res gestæ may be admissible against him, under general rules as to the admissibility of declarations Thus the accused's subsequent declarations may be admitted to prove such matters as his commission of the crime, consciousness of guilt, and state of mind The accused s subsequent threats have been admitted in a number of cases, although not in others

Declarations of accused made subsequently to the homicide and constituting a part of the res gestæ may be proved[2] Subject to the rules applicable to the admissibility of declarations generally, as discussed in Criminal Law §§ 730-753, his subsequent statements may be admissible against him even though not part of the res gestæ,[3] and if relevant to any issue involved,[4] but not where the only possible

purpose of showing them is to create a prejudice against him,[5] and it must first be made to appear that a crime has been committed.[6] Where they are not part of the res gestæ, statements and declarations of accused are not admissible in his behalf,[7] especially where they partake of the nature of self-serving declarations,[8] or are in the nature of a narrative of a past transaction,[9] or amount merely to an effort by accused to manufacture evidence in his own behalf.[10] However, on an issue as to flight, it has been held that statements by accused indicating his willingness that his whereabouts be made known to those in the vicinity of the crime are admissible.[11]

of showing the absence of remorse,[17] or showing consciousness of guilt,[18] guilty knowledge of the offense,[19] apprehension on accused's own account because of deceased's condition,[20] an attempt to suppress evidence or intimidate a witness,[21] or that the defense set up was fabrication and an afterthought.[22] So it is proper to show conflicting statements by accused as to circumstances connected with the homicide,[23] or as to his movements or whereabouts at about the time of the crime.[24]

Threats made by accused after the homicide or assault have been admitted where they indicate a consciousness of guilt and fear of discovery on his part,[26] or shed light on the animus with which the act was done,[27] or show accused's attitude or state of mind,[28] or were made in aid of his design to flee from arrest,[29] and his statement that if he had not killed the victim he would do so,[30] or that if the victim was not dead he would kill him,[31] has likewise been admitted. In other cases, however, subsequent threats have been held not admissible.[32]

Explanation and rebuttal. Accused may introduce evidence in explanation of his declarations,[33] so he is entitled to testify as to his undisclosed purpose or motive.[34] Where the state proves a statement by accused charging another with the crime, he may show his information as the basis for such charge,[35] but not mere rumors not shown to have been conveyed to him.[36] Where accused showed his expressions of grief as res gestæ, it was competent for the state in rebuttal to show his expressions to other witnesses to the opposite effect, although made some time after the killing.[37]

Evidence as to accused's mental condition after the homicide may be shown as affecting the weight to be given by the jury to his declarations.[38]

Codefendant. The declarations of one accused of a crime may be admissible on behalf of his codefendant as part of the res gestæ,[39] but where the issue between the prosecution and accused is whether he or his codefendant committed the homicide, evidence of a statement made by the codefendant, that accused had killed the deceased, is incompetent [40]

b. Of Victim

Declarations made by the victim shortly after receiving the wound may be admitted if they constitute part of the res gestæ, but generally not otherwise, except in the case of dying declarations, but declarations of the victim in the accused's presence may be admitted to show the accused's conduct, such as his silence, when charged with causing the injury

Declarations made by the victim shortly after receiving the wound may be admitted as part of the res gestæ,[41] although they were not made in the presence of accused,[42] but, except in the case of dying declarations,[43] and whether offered by the state or accused,[44] the declarations of the victim are not admissible where they were made some time after the commission of the criminal act and form no part of the res gestæ,[45] but are rather in the nature of a narrative statement of what occurred at the time of the alleged homicide,[46] or where they do not throw any light on the circumstances of the killing but tend to prejudice the jury against accused [47] Although not dying declarations, declarations of the victim made in the presence of accused may be given in evidence, under certain circumstances, for the purpose of showing accused's conduct and behavior, such as his silence, when charged with causing the injury done to the victim,[48] but not, it has been held, when accused was at the time under arrest [49]

Evidence that the victim, while in the presence of accused, identified the latter as the person who committed the crime is admissible,[50] but an accusation of accused by the victim, which accused immediately denies has been declared not admissible.[51] It has been held that statements of the victim, after the shooting, including threats, are admissible to show the state of mind of the victim [52] Where accused has introduced evidence that the victim refused to make a dying declaration, evidence as to a statement by the victim relating to the matter is admissible in rebuttal [53]

The victim's statements, made in accused's presence, that his fatal wound was accidentally inflicted have been held inadmissible as hearsay,[54] and not binding on the state [55]

A natural and spontaneous exclamation of pain by the victim may be shown, even though not made in the presence of accused [56] Where a physician is called to testify, the history of the case, as related to him by deceased for the purpose of securing treatment, is admissible [57]

The exclusion of a nurse's testimony that the victim had told her he did not know who injured him was held not erroneous, where accused on cross-examination showed by a physician that the victim had said he did not know who had injured him, but did not say that accused had not [58]

c. Of Third Persons

Declarations of third persons are as a rule not admissible, especially when made out of the accused's presence and hearing, and for any purpose other than to impeach a witness; but a statement to the accused or in his presence may be admissible.

While statements tending to show preconcert between declarant and accused may be admitted,[59] and a statement by a third person, as part of the res gestæ, that he shot and accused did not is admissible,[60] declarations of third persons are as a rule not admissible, in a trial for homicide or assault with intent to kill or murder,[61] especially when made out of the presence and hearing of accused,[62] and for any purpose other than to impeach a witness,[63] and such testimony, impeaching a witness, is not competent as substantive evidence as to how the difficulty occurred.[64] A statement made directly to accused with reference to the crime,[65] or in his presence,[66] and evidence of what took place when accused was taken before the victim for identification,[67] may be admitted, but not where accused was not permitted to speak.[68]

Where a witness who testified concerning a homicide was nearly killed herself by one who murdered deceased, her declaration, shortly after the homicide, that she expected to die, and that she wanted a neighbor to be sent for, so that she could tell him all about it, was held admissible as confirmatory evidence.[69]

§ 253. Commission of or Attempt to Commit Other Offenses

Evidence that the killing was done in the commission of a felony is admissible to establish that the killing constituted murder.

To establish that a killing constituted murder, evidence to show that it was done in the commission of, or in an attempt to commit, a felony is admissible.[70] In a proper case, testimony in rebuttal of evidence of the commission of another crime by accused should be admitted.[71]

A general discussion of the competency in a homicide prosecution of evidence of the commission of other offenses by accused is to be found in Criminal Law § 691 m.

§ 254. Killing of Person Attempting Arrest or Officer Making Search

Any competent and relevant evidence tending to show that accused killed deceased while the latter was, to the knowledge of accused, lawfully attempting to arrest him is admissible.

In a prosecution for killing an arresting officer, evidence that deceased at the time of the homicide was endeavoring to effect accused's arrest,[72] that accused was armed and resisted arrest,[73] and that accused was a fugitive from justice[74] is admissible. So also is evidence on the issue whether accused was resisting a lawful attempt to arrest him, or in good faith making a defense against an unlawful assault on himself.[75] The warrant of arrest, if regular on its face, is admissible to establish the fact that deceased was an officer acting in the discharge of his duty when he was killed,[76] although held by another officer, the companion of the officer killed[77] Warrants not in all respects regular, but which authorize accused's arrest, are admissible,[78] and parol evidence is admissible to show that the warrant was sufficient for attempting arrest[79] Evidence that deceased procured a warrant and went to accused's home ostensibly to arrest him was admissible as characterizing his attitude toward accused and to account for his presence, although the warrant may have been illegal and have furnished no protection to the officer[80] Evidence is admissible of circumstances justifying an arrest without a warrant,[81] or a search of accused's person without a warrant[82] Thus it may be shown that accused had committed a felony,[83] that such fact had been communicated to deceased,[84] that the officer had reasonable belief of accused's guilt,[85] or that his conduct and threats demanded his arrest without a warrant[86] Evidence of the former felony is admissible to show the attitude of accused resisting arrest[87] Evidence of the former felony, however, is not admissible on the trial for killing one who has attempted an arrest without warrant, when such arrest is not justified by any honest and well founded belief of accused's complicity therein[88] Presumptive knowledge on the part of the prisoner of the official character of deceased may be established by circumstantial evidence[89] However, where deceased was not an officer, evidence that he was dressed as an officer and wore the insignia of office is not admissible[90] In a prosecution for the murder of a private citizen who was aiding officers to apprehend accused, evidence is admissible to show deceased's intention in pursuing accused,[91] and the knowledge of accused of such intention[92]

Where accused's negligence is an element of the offense charged, competent and relevant evidence of such negligence is admissible

Where negligence of accused is an element of the offense charged, see supra § 62, competent and relevant evidence of such negligence is admissible[93] The effect on others of the accident in which deceased was killed may be shown[94] While, as appears supra § 62, the conduct of deceased, if amounting to contributory negligence, is no defense to a charge of manslaughter, it is material and relevant to the extent that it bears on the question of the negligence of accused,[95] but not otherwise[96] Evidence offered on behalf of accused of similar accidents at the same place is properly excluded[97]

(2) Statement by injured party that he stayed in bed nearly six

cused,[99] and to be considered in determining the punishment.[1] A physician or surgeon who has examined such wounds may testify as to their character,[2] and as to what in his opinion would be the natural and probable results thereof,[3] and the time and medical attention necessary to heal them.[4] Other causes contributing to the illness of the person assaulted following the assault may be shown on behalf of accused.[5]

§ 257. Cause of Death

a In general
b Post-mortem examinations

a. In General

Any competent and relative evidence is admissible to show the cause of death or to show that a particular circumstance was not the cause of death. An expert must qualify to testify as such, but a layman may also testify as to the cause of death in some instances.

As a general rule any evidence which shows or tends to show the cause of the death of deceased is admissible.[6] Thus evidence is admissible as to the character and location of the wounds on the body of deceased,[7] of his previous state of health,[8] of particular symptoms of poisoning,[9] of how deceased acted at the time he was said to have been poisoned,[10] or of the finding by a physician of poison in the stomach of deceased.[11] Direct testimony as to the wounds inflicted on deceased and his subsequent death is of course admissible.[12] The court cannot be put in error in admitting such evidence by the subsequent admission by accused that he killed deceased.[13] It having been proved that accused beat deceased, complaints of pain made by deceased within a short time of the beating are admissible in evidence.[14] In connection with evidence of physicians that death was caused by abortion, evidence as to the details of the last sickness, the medicine taken, and attendance received is admissible.[15] Evidence of symptoms of poisoning experienced by witnesses who partook of portions of the same substance by which deceased came to death is admissible,[16] but the symptoms produced by the administration of a particular kind of poison cannot be shown by evidence of the circumstances of the illness and death of a third person who is alleged to have died from the same poison,[17] particularly where the implication is present that accused was also responsible for that death.[18] Where an issue is raised as to whether some circ-

cumstance other than the act of accused caused death, evidence tending to disprove such contention is admissible.[19] Of course, all evidence offered to establish the cause of death is subject to the general rules of law excluding irrelevant evidence[20]

Evidence on behalf of accused generally Subject to the usual rules of relevancy, materiality, and competency,[21] evidence is admissible on behalf of accused which tends to disprove that death was caused by an act or injury performed or inflicted by him,[22] or to prove that other injuries were in fact the cause of death,[23] but evidence of other injuries is inadmissible where they are not shown to have occurred within such time as to render them material[24] Evidence tending to show causes, other than administration by accused, for the presence of poisons in deceased's body may be admitted[25] However, evidence that deceased took poison medicinally several years before his death is not admissible unless accompanied by evidence that he also took it shortly before his death,[26] and evidence that deceased took large quantities of a certain drug several months before his death is properly rejected where no evidence is offered to connect his death with the use of the drug[27] Similarly, evidence that deceased had previously suffered from a poisoned condition due to disease is not admissible in the absence of a showing that such condition existed at the time of death[28] Since accused is liable if he inflicts a wound which causes death, although the life of decedent might have been saved by skillful treatment, see supra § 11, where death follows an injury without other independent intervening cause calculated to produce the death of the injured person had he not been injured by the wrongful act of accused, proof of lack of proper treatment which might have saved or prolonged his life cannot be shown[29] Accused may show, if he can, that the wound was not calculated to endanger or destroy life and that deceased died solely from improper treatment[30] Where the criminal act of accused is clearly shown to have caused death, evidence of a diseased condition which accelerated it is properly excluded[31] Where the body of deceased indicated physical violence, it has been held that evidence of the turning on of gas, to show accident or suicide, is properly excluded[32] Where there is evidence of licentiousness and debauchery of deceased which would account for her death and the symptoms of the last illness, evidence of particular occasions of drunkenness not shown to have been connected with the death is inadmissible[33]

Expert and opinion evidence A properly qualified physician who has himself examined the body of deceased, or in response to a hypothetical question on the facts as to it described by other witnesses, may be allowed to express his opinion as to the cause of the death of deceased,[34] or may state

Where deceased was in good health when shot by defendants with a pistol and died a few hours later, and a physician testified that his death was caused by internal hemorrhage from the wound, evidence that he had previously been wounded was properly excluded, he having recovered from the previous wound.—State v. Sisemore, 92 So. 274, 151 La. 675

Evidence held inadmissible

(1) Exclusion in murder prosecution of testimony that witnesses had seen a tank on a certain model of automobile explode was held not error, where it was not claimed that decedent's automobile had exploded.—People v. Hanson, 191 N.E. 520, 359 Ill. 266

(2) In prosecution for murder by poison, exclusion of testimony that deceased took medicines recommended by her neighbors, and as result thereof became more ill than before taking medicine, was held proper, in absence of proof that such medicines were poisonous.—State v. Identification of deceased as person examined

Where a physician testified that he attended a negro brought to him by another physician, testimony of the other physician that he carried deceased to the first witness, and that it was the only case of the kind, sufficiently identified the negro referred to by the first witness to render his testimony concerning cause in what different ways death might have been caused,[35] or that no natural cause of death was discovered,[36] or that death was not from a particular cause,[37] and similar evidence may be given by the physician attending deceased between the time of the injury and his death,[38] or by other qualified experts,[39] such as chemists.[40] In any event, an expert witness must be qualified as such,[41] and an expert cannot give his opinion as to matters as to which the jury are equally as competent to draw inferences from the evidence.[42] A lay witness who has viewed the body and examined the wound or wounds may give his opinion as to the cause of death,[43] and an ordinary witness may testify as to the cause of death where it is within his knowledge.[44] So, where the opinions of experts are not available, nonexperts, after describing the wounds, may state whether, in their opinion, they caused the death.[45] Where deceased died through a knife wound in his throat, evidence of nonexpert witnesses, as to whether in cases of suicide which they had observed committed in that manner the muscles of the hand were relaxed or rigid after death, is not admissible.[46]

b. Post-Mortem Examinations

Evidence of a post-mortem examination of the body of deceased is admissible to show the cause of death, even though it was made after the prosecution had been commenced and without notice to accused.

Evidence of a post-mortem examination of the body of deceased is admissible to show the cause of death.[47] The fact that a post-mortem examination was made long after death is no reason in itself for its exclusion as evidence, if the body was in such a state of preservation that the jury could judge whether its condition was caused by injuries inflicted before or after death.[48] Evidence obtained by making a post-mortem examination is not inadmissible because such examination was made after a prosecution for murder had been commenced,[49] and without notice to accused.[50] An expert may properly testify that a larger quantity of a drug had been in the system of deceased before death than that found at a post-mortem.[51] Questions asked a medical expert, based on a hypothetical state of facts assumed to have been proved, relative to the condition of the body as shown at an autopsy, are properly admitted in a trial for murder, notwithstanding accused's objections to the manner of making the autopsy.[52] Two witnesses having testified

Evidence of the result of a chemical analysis of an organ or substance is admissible to show the cause of death when and only when it is sufficiently identified as the organ or substance it is purported to be

Testimony as to the result of a chemical analysis should not be admitted in the absence of sufficient evidence identifying the organ or substance analyzed as the organ or substance it is purported to be [54] However, the identification need not be positive [55] It is not necessary to the admission of testimony regarding the analysis of the internal organs of deceased that they shall have been placed in hermetically sealed jars,[56] or so preserved as to preclude the possibility of their having been tampered with,[57] or that the expert chemist be sworn before taking charge of or analyzing them,[58] but it is necessary to satisfy the court that the organs were in the same condition when examined as when removed from the body [59] Evidence of precautions to insure the identity of the organs submitted is of course admissible [60] Where poison is alleged to have been placed in food of which deceased partook, before the jury can consider evidence of an analysis of the food, the jury must be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the food was a part of the same which caused the death, and had not been tampered with between the time it came into the hands of the analysts and its examination [61] Where the question arises whether a particular substance introduced into deceased's body contained a certain poison or a certain amount thereof, it is proper to admit evidence of the result of a chemical analysis of some of the same substance taken from the identical box, bottle, package, or other container from which the original substance had been taken [62] Furthermore, testimony of a chemist who analyzed another container of the same substance is admissible where there is sufficient evidence of the likeness between the substance analyzed and the substance introduced into deceased's body [63] So, where accused has procured an article of trade which is shown by the evidence to be a uniform article, a chemical analysis of another box of the article showing that it contained the poison which had been administered is admissible [64] It has been held, however, that, where evidence has been given of the chemical composition of the substance left in the container out of which the substance introduced into deceased's body had been taken, cross-examination as to the chemical composition of the contents of other containers may be properly excluded [65] In order to render admissible evidence of a chemical analysis of the body showing the presence of poison in deadly quantities, it is not essential that there be evidence negativing the possibility that such poison was introduced into the body otherwise than through the agency of accused [66]

§ 258. —— Means or Instruments Used

Evidence tending to prove the character or identity of the weapon or means used to commit the offense is admissible, as is evidence bearing on the question whether the weapon used was one calculated and likely to produce death

It is competent for the state to prove the character or identity of the weapon or means used [67] Thus evidence is admissible as to the finding at or

Where accused testifies that he formerly owned a certain revolver, but has disposed of it to his codefendant, evidence as to the finding of the revolver near the place of the commission of the crime is pertinent,[75] but evidence of the finding of a weapon of a kind not shown to have been used[76] and not traced to the possession of accused,[77] or of the condition of a weapon, not connected with the use thereof at the time of the killing,[78] or of a bullet not shown to have any connection with, or tending to solve, any issue in the case,[79] is inadmissible. Evidence in relation to the examination of guns in the neighborhood, to ascertain whether any of them carried a bullet of the size of one found in the body of deceased, is admissible.[80] Testimony of a physician who conducted an autopsy on the bodies of other persons killed at the same time as the person for the killing of whom accused is on trial is admissible to show that the killing was accomplished in such instance by the same instrument.[81] When properly identified and connected with the crime, the weapon itself is admissible.[82]

Evidence of the nature of the wound caused by the weapon used is admissible to show whether the weapon was one calculated and likely to produce death,[83] and evidence that the wound could not have been made with the gun of accused,[84] or that the weapon used was insufficient to inflict death or serious bodily harm under the circumstances in which it was used,[85] is admissible in behalf of accused Where an instrument with which an assault was committed and a serious injury was inflicted is before the jury, no further direct proof of its deadly character is necessary,[86] but the admission of testimony with reference thereto is not error[87] It is not error to permit the prosecuting witness in a prosecution for assault with intent to kill to describe in his testimony the weapon with which he was assaulted and other similar weapons merely because the state could not procure the particular weapon with which the assault was made,[88] especially where it was last seen in the hands of accused who fled presumedly with it in his hand[89] Any witness, after describing an instrument, may express under oath the opinion that it is capable of causing death[90]

b Causes
c Rebuttal

a. In General

Any competent evidence on the issue of accused's insanity is admissible, and much latitude is permitted in the introduction of evidence as to accused's acts, condition, and conduct both before and after the offense in so far as it bears on this defense

Provided it is properly within the issues raised by the pleadings, see supra § 175, accused is entitled to a hearing of any competent evidence in his behalf offered on the issue of his sanity[91] To be admissible to sustain this defense, the evidence must tend to cause a reasonable man to doubt accused's sanity,[92] and not merely to prove that accused was eccentric, passionate, and excitable,[93] or mentally unbalanced, although not insane,[94] or of low mentality[95] Clearly matters not throwing any light on the mental condition of accused are inadmissible[96] Accused may be permitted to testify whether he knew what he was doing at the time of the offense,[97] or that he was acting under an impulse which he could not control[98] A lay witness who has testified to facts sufficient to form the basis of an opinion as to accused's sanity may state his opinion,[99] but a witness may not, in the guise of testifying as to facts, state his conclusion concerning a particular occurrence rather than what he observed[1] A comparison of the actions of accused with those of insane persons is inadmissible[2] Evidence of the presence or absence of motive on the part of accused is admissible on the issue of insanity[3]

Time and scope of inquiry Much latitude is generally permitted in the introduction of evidence as to the acts, condition, and conduct of accused,[5] and, while such evidence is clearly admissible where it relates to the time of the offense,[6] it is also admissible where it relates to events or conditions prior[7] and subsequent[8] thereto While it has been said broadly that, where the defense is insanity, every act of accused's life is relevant to the issue,[9] and that the law fixes no particular limitation as to the period of time which the inquiry may cover,[10] nevertheless, there is a reasonable discretion in the trial court to restrict such evidence,[11] and such evidence may be excluded where it is too remote,[12] or does not have a tendency to show the mental condition of accused at the time of the act charged [13] So, where considerable time has elapsed since a homicide, the admission or rejection of evidence of subsequent insanity is within the judicial discretion of the trial court [14]

Evidence of adjudication Proof of an inquisition of lunacy resulting in a verdict of sanity or insanity is admissible, although it is not conclusive [15] While there is authority for the view that the entire record of such proceedings is admissible,[16] other authorities hold that only proof of the adjudication may be admitted, and that the evidence adduced at the inquisition is incompetent,[17] particularly where the inquisition resulted in a verdict of sanity [18] A verdict as to accused's sanity subsequent to the commission of the offense has been held inadmissible,[19] but it has also been held that a subsequent adjudication of insanity is admissible as bearing on the question of accused's sanity at the time of the offense.[20]

Declarations and statements. Declarations by accused or statements in conversations tending to show his mental condition at the time of the homicide have been held admissible,[21] whether made at the time of,[22] before,[23] or after[24] the homicide, but on the other hand, evidence of general conversations between accused and a witness on the day of the homicide has been held inadmissible.[25]

Reputation and belief. Reports current in the neighborhood where accused resides concerning the condition of his mind are not generally admissible on the question of insanity.[26] The belief of accused's relatives is not competent on the issue.[27]

b. Causes

Evidence of facts or circumstances tending to render the accused insane generally is held admissible provided there is other proof of his insanity.

It is generally held that evidence of facts or circumstances tending to render accused insane is admissible,[28] and the fact that accused's insanity took the form of an insane delusion or frenzy, and the actuating cause thereof, may be shown,[29] provided there is evidence in the case of his insanity,[30] and, according to one view, provided there is substantial proof of latent insanity or latent tendency to insane paroxysms.[31] The competency of evidence of circumstances of provocation, introduced to show their effect as causing insanity of accused, is not affected by the fact that the killing was done deliberately.[32] The admissibility of such evidence is subject to the usual rules excluding incompetent, immaterial, or irrelevant evidence.[33] Facts which, if known to accused, might have produced insanity, cannot be proved if they were not known to accused at the time of the homicide.[34] Where accused claims that he killed deceased because of insanity produced by the information of deceased's misconduct on a certain occasion, evidence of the truth of such information,[35] or of deceased's conduct on other occasions,[36] is inadmissible. Where evidence has been received of the confession of accused's wife to him as to misconduct of deceased, and of accused's prior knowledge of deceased's licentious conduct with other women, the details of his conduct with such

Incriminating statement before warning

Unless they are admissible as res gestæ, incriminating statements made by accused after the homicide, without his having been warned that what he said might be used against him, are inadmissible even though limited to the issue of insanity.—Calloway v. State, 244 S.W. 549, 92 Tex. Cr. 506.

Injuries to accused

(1) Evidence as to injuries received by accused, and effect of such injuries on his mind and ability to know what he was doing, was competent on plea of insanity.—State v. Nall, 188 S.E. 637, 211 N.C. 61—30 C.J. p. 222 note 41 [a].

(2) Where one of the defenses on trial for homicide was that deceased attacked accused, and committed injuries which rendered accused mentally irresponsible, and that while in that condition, if at all, accused killed deceased and her child, evidence of deceased's uncommunicated threats to kill accused was admissible to show an intention from which it might be inferred that deceased was the aggressor.—Commonwealth v. Normal sexual relations

In a trial for murder, where accused seeks to show that he was insane at the time of the homicide, as the result of a disease, it is not material from whom or in what manner he contracted such disease.—State v. Price, 115 S.E. 393, 92 W. Va. 542.

women are inadmissible[37] Evidence of specific acts of violence by deceased toward accused has been held inadmissible to show insanity[38]

Heredity Accused can show a tendency to hereditary insanity by showing insanity of his kinsmen,[39] provided it is offered in connection with other evidence directly tending to show that accused is himself insane[40] and the evidence offered for such purpose is competent and relevant,[41] and it is held that the remoteness of evidence of a hereditary tendency to insanity affects its force and not its competency[42] The insanity of accused's ancestors or relatives cannot be proved by reputation,[43] or by statements on a family tree of accused[44] It has been held that evidence of insanity of collateral kindred is not admissible[45] unless there is proof that such insanity was inherited from a common ancestor,[46] but other cases have held that such evidence is admissible,[47] and that the degree that the collateral insane relative is removed from accused goes only to the weight of the evidence[48] It has also been held that the admission of insanity in accused's collateral kinsmen lies, within reasonable limitations, in the discretion of the trial court[49]

(2) Thus testimony that accused, while being prosecuted for another crime made threats against the charge of the prosecuting attorney, and stated that, if convicted, he would kill both and claim insanity is admissible to show that accused was feigning insanity at the time he was confined in insane asylum—State v Tarwater 239 S W 480, 293 Mo 273

Intelligence tests

Intelligence of accused disclosed by various intelligence tests was properly admitted in rebutting defense of lack of mental capacity to murder—Clark v State, 156 N E 219, 23 Ohio App 474

Prior threats

In a murder prosecution, in which defense was insanity, claimed to have been caused by statements told accused the night before the homicide as to certain acts of deceased where accused, in aid of his defense testified that on the night of the homicide everything turned black" just before the killing, evidence in behalf of state that ten days before the homicide accused was drunk, and threatened to kill somebody, held admissible, being in a measure rebuttal in character—People v Siscovich, 226 P 611 193 Cal 544

Intoxication

(1) In murder prosecution, where defense was insanity testimony offered in rebuttal of affirmative testimony relating to insanity to show that at time of killing accused was drunk and engaged in usual habit of pulling pistol and attempting to kill some one when in such condition, was admissible—Chapman v State, 124 S W 2d 112 136 Tex Cr 285 rehearing denied 124 S W 2d 996 136 Tex Cr 285

(2) Evidence of intoxication generally see infra § 260

Limiting effect of evidence

In murder trial refusal to limit testimony of fellow employee of defendant as to accused's duties manner of discharging them etc to issue of insanity vel non held not error where there was no other real issue in cause and it did not appear that limitation would have been more than useless ceremony or of any possible benefit to accused—Kilpatrick v State 104 So 656, 213 Ala 358

Evidence held admissible

(1) Where accused in murder prosecution attempted to establish mental incapacity and offered evidence to establish infidelity of his deceased wife by rumor and by specific acts or circumstances as bearing on his mental condition, state had right to refute and rebut such evidence by showing that no such rumors or grounds therefor existed—Morris v State 175 So 283 234 Ala 520 appeal dismissed Morris v State of Alabama, 58 S Ct 58, 302 U S 642 82 L Ed 499 rehearing denied 58 S Ct 264, 302 U S 778, 82 L Ed 602

(2) Police officer's evidence that, provided it is relevant and the matters offered clearly relate to accused[51] The remoteness of the time referred to in such evidence goes to its weight rather than to its admissibility[52] Evidence tending to show that accused is of sound mind will not be rejected because it tends to prove another offense[53] Where insanity is pleaded the state may prove that during the period covered by accused's conduct as testified to by his witnesses, accused was under the influence of liquor and was intoxicated at the time of the killing[54] After evidence of a disease impairing accused's memory has been received, cross-examination to test his memory is competent[55] Evidence of the absence of reports of accused's insanity in the neighborhood in which he resides prior to the homicide has been held admissible in rebuttal of evidence of insanity of long standing[56] Where accused asserts that he was acting under an insane delusion, the state is entitled to introduce evidence bearing on the question of general insanity[57] and the conduct of accused as showing or failing to show general insanity may be considered in order to determine whether or not he is laboring under a delusion[58]

Evidence tending to show the accused's state of intoxication at the time of the offense generally is held admissible, at least as bearing on the question of deliberation and premeditation, malice, or intent

Although, as appears supra § 5, voluntary intoxication does not excuse a homicide, nevertheless, as a general rule evidence of intoxication of accused is held admissible as tending to cast some light on the circumstances of the crime,[59] or on the issue of immediately after homicide, accused who pleaded insanity "seemed all right" and that he "talked rationally," was admissible to show accused's appearance, emotions, and mental condition—Deloney v State, 142 So 432, 225 Ala 65

(3) Testimony respecting liquor on premises held admissible in murder prosecution in view of contradiction between witnesses as to whether accused and brother taking part in difficulty were drunk at time of killing State v Ussery, 152 So 302, 178 La 593

(4) In murder prosecution, evidence that shortly before homicide accused and his associates demanded money from other persons held admissible as showing that accused and his associates were drunk—Burke v Commonwealth, 66 S W 2d 21 252 Ky 34

(5) In prosecution of negro for shooting and wounding with intent to kill, testimony of victim's white niece that accused had insulted her was admissible as bearing on whether accused and victim left cafe and were together on street at time of shooting, and on whether accused was intoxicated as testified to by other witness—McClain v Commonwealth, 144 S W 2d 816, 284 Ky 359

deliberation and premeditation,[60] even though accused voluntarily became drunk[61] for the purpose of nerving himself to commit the homicide,[62] or on the issue of malice[63] or intent.[64] Sometimes such evidence is held admissible to lower the grade of the crime,[65] as, for example, to lessen the offense to murder in the second degree,[66] and there is authority for the view that such evidence may be considered only to determine the degree of the crime.[67] According to some authorities, evidence of intoxication is admissible only for the purpose of determining whether accused was capable of entertaining the specific intent or malice which is an indispensable ingredient of certain grades of the offense,[68] and only where there is no evidence of actual malice or intent,[69] it is not admissible, apart from its bearing on the question of specific intent, for the purpose of reducing the crime to manslaughter[70] or of rebutting evidence of actual malice.[71] Other authorities hold, contrary to the general weight of opinion above stated, that evidence of intoxication is never admissible, whether to show that murder was not committed, to reduce its grade, or to determine whether accused acted willfully, deliberately, and premeditatedly,[72] but this rule has been held not to require the exclusion of evidence of accused's intoxication offered by the state to refute some other defense relied on by accused.[73]

Evidence of intoxication shortly after the homicide is admissible in corroboration of evidence of intoxication at the time thereof,[74] but in the absence of evidence of intoxication at the time of the offense such evidence has been held inadmissible.[75] Evidence that accused was drinking or intoxicated shortly before the homicide is also held admissible[76] as bearing on his state of intoxication at the time of the offense[77] where,[78] and only where,[79] there is other evidence that he was intoxicated at the time of the offense. Where there is evidence of drunkenness of accused at the time of the offense, its probable degree, it is held, may be illustrated by showing that it was immediately preceded by protracted drinking.[80] It has, however, also been held that, unless it is relevant to an issue of insanity properly raised in the case, it is not error to exclude evidence of intoxication for a long time prior to the offense.[81] Evidence that accused was in the habit at times of drinking to excess,[82] and of the effect of this habit on his mind[83] is incompetent, unless it is confined to a period near the time of the homicide[84] or is offered in corroboration of other evidence that he was drunk at the time of the offense,[85] and evidence of accused's habit of drinking to excess is inadmissible where the evidence affirmatively shows his sobriety at the time of the offense.[86] Where the evidence sought to be adduced relating to intoxication is wholly irrelevant and immaterial, and does not tend to throw light on any issue in the case, it should be excluded.[87] So evidence that accused had been drinking at other times has been held inadmissible where it had no bearing on his capacity to commit the crime.[88]

Evidence is admissible on behalf of the prosecution to rebut the defense of intoxication,[89] and, conversely, accused has a right to refute evidence for the state that he was intoxicated.[90]

§ 261. Somnambulism

Proof that the crime was committed during a paroxysm of somnambulism is admissible

One accused of crime is entitled to offer evidence to prove that he committed the crime while in a paroxysm of somnolentia or somnambulism.[91]

Evidence of circumstances of provocation, as tending to arouse passion, is admissible in mitigation of the crime

Evidence of circumstances of provocation, as tending to arouse passion, is admissible in mitigation of the crime,[92] as, for example, to disprove premeditation.[93] Evidence of such facts, to be admissible, must tend directly to establish provocation[94] of the character required to accomplish the purpose for which it is offered.[95] They must also have been within the knowledge of accused at the time of the killing,[96] and that they were within his

Circumstances making accused especially excitable

Evidence that, by reason of a sunstroke, a sudden quarrel would more readily excite in accused a blinding passion than in the case of the average man, was not admissible as bearing on accused's contention that the killing was done in the heat of passion and was at most manslaughter, since to reduce the crime to manslaughter, the provocation must be such as would have affected the average person in the same way.—People v Golsh, supra knowledge cannot be shown by general reputation of the alleged matter of provocation [97] To render proof thereof admissible, matters of provocation must be so recent that the passions have not had time to cool before the homicide, see infra § 265, but the proof need not be limited to acts of provocation occurring at the time of the homicide [98] Where it is not certain whether accused designed to effect the death of deceased and his act was not one likely to cause death, evidence is admissible that shortly before the homicide accused was informed by a third person of matters of a provocative nature which would be likely to induce him to chastise deceased [99] Evidence of intoxication may be considered in determining whether the crime was done in the heat of passion caused by sufficient provocation [1] Evidence of provocation by one person is inadmissible in mitigation of punishment for the killing of another who did not encourage or prompt the act of provocation [2]

The prosecution may introduce evidence to rebut accused's claim of provocation [3] Where accused pleads in mitigation a communication made to him by deceased, evidence of the nonexistence of the fact forming the subject matter of the communication generally is incompetent and inadmissible [4]

§ 263. —— Insults and Defamation

Evidence of insulting or outrageous conduct or language by the deceased toward a member of the accused's family, and particularly a female relative, or evidence that the accused was informed of such conduct, is admissible to show provocation

Insulting or outrageous conduct or language offered by deceased to a member of accused's family or a female relative may be shown in evidence as affording a sufficient provocation to reduce the degree of the crime,[5] where it is first shown that accused had knowledge thereof when he killed deceased [6] Such evidence, however, to be admissible, must have direct connection with the crime charged [7] Provided time enough for the cooling of passions had not elapsed, as discussed infra § 265, evidence of accused's learning of deceased's insulting conduct is admissible although the homicide did not follow immediately on accused's receipt of the information,[8] but under some statutes, in the absence of a fresh insult thereafter, the evidence is inadmissible unless the killing occurred at the first meeting between accused and deceased following accused's learning of the insulting conduct [9] In determining accused's claimed belief in a statement claimed to have been made to him by a female relative, of an insult offered to her by the man whom accused afterward shot, it has been held on the one hand that it is proper for the jury to consider the truthfulness of that statement,[10] but, on the other hand, it has been held proper to exclude such evidence [11] On an issue as to provocation by insults to or defamation of a female relative of accused, evidence of the good or bad character of deceased or the person assaulted for chastity is held irrelevant,[12] except to show accused's belief of the information received by him as to the conduct of deceased [13] Accused's previous treatment of his wife is relevant in determining the effect on his mind of the information that deceased had insulted her [14] Evidence of opprobrious epithets applied to accused by deceased at the time of the commission of the homicide is admissible [15] The admissi-

In prosecution for assault with intent to murder

Evidence of opprobrious words or abusive language used by the person assaulted at or near the time of the assault are not admissible in mitigation in a prosecution for an assault bility of evidence of the truth of insulting words has been both sustained[16] and denied[17]

Evidence is admissible to rebut the defense of provocation by insulting or outrageous conduct,[18] and, on the other hand, to rebut the contention of the state that such defense was fabricated[19]

Character of female insulted Where insulting conduct toward a female relative of accused is relied on to reduce the degree of the offense, the reputation and character of the female are put in issue under some statutes[20] Under such statutes the rule with regard to evidence of reputation is the same as that which applies to reputation of witnesses[21] Remoteness of time to which such evidence relates generally bears only on its weight and not on its admissibility,[22] but the state cannot show unchastity of the female before marriage long before the killing[23] Evidence that the female had been guilty of specific acts of immoral conduct with another person of which accused had knowledge prior to the killing is admissible,[24] and, where accused attempts to show his belief that such relations were the first on the part of his relative, the prosecution may introduce evidence to show his knowledge to the contrary[25] In the absence of such a statute, it has been held that where accused has shown improper relations between deceased and a female relative of accused, the prosecution is not thereupon entitled to show the lewdness of such female with other men[26]

§ 264. —— Infidelity of Husband or Wife

Competent and relevant evidence of a spouse's infidelity is admissible as bearing on the question of provocation

Accused on trial for the murder of his wife may show that he was informed, and believed, that she had been unfaithful, as bearing on the question of provocation,[27] although such evidence has been held irrelevant to the issue where the defense was a denial of the commission of the homicide[28] While it has been held that testimony of accused as to what he had heard prior to the difficulty concerning improper relations between deceased and his wife is inadmissible in the absence of evidence of threats or other predicate,[29] the general rule is that such evidence is admissible for the purpose of showing provocation[30] It has been held that deceased's criminal intimacy with accused's wife may be shown to corroborate evidence that such fact was communicated to accused before the killing,[31] but, on the other hand, proof of the truth of the wife's confession has been excluded on the ground that the only question involved is the effect the confession had on the mind of accused[32] The state may offer

§ 265. —— Cooling Time

Provocative circumstances occurring so long before the homicide as to allow the blood to cool may not be proved in mitigation, but may be considered in connection with more recent provocation

Evidence of circumstances alleged as provocation is inadmissible in mitigation if sufficient time for the blood to cool has elapsed between the occurrence of such circumstances and the homicide,[38] but such evidence may be considered in connection with more recent provocation in determining accused's state of mind at the time of the killing [39] The state may show that accused knew the circumstances of the alleged provocation long before the homicide, and that he had met deceased several times in the interim [40]

penalty for murder in the first degree has been held to rest largely within the trial judge's sound judicial discretion.[47] Concealment and flight are circumstances of little, if any, bearing on the grade of a homicide,[48] although, as appears supra § 251, evidence thereof is admissible as tending to show guilt Where the jury have nothing to do with fixing the punishment, evidence that goes only to the mitigation of punishment is irrelevant and inadmissible.[49] Evidence tending to show the degree of the offense, which is to be determined by the jury, is admissible.[50] Accordingly evidence as to the presence or absence of particular elements affecting the degree of the offense is admissible,[51] including particular matters made an element of the higher degree by statute.[52] So, under statutory provisions making the use of a weapon concealed before the affray an element of murder, evidence of such concealment is, of course, admissible on a trial for murder,[53] although not on a trial for manslaughter.[54]

§ 267. Excuse or Justification in General

Any legitimate evidence tending to show matters which would excuse or justify the act of the accused or which would rebut evidence of justification is admissible.

On the trial of an indictment for murder any legitimate evidence tending to show matters which would excuse or justify the act of accused is admissible on his behalf.[55] Thus accused may introduce evidence to show that the killing was accidental,[56] or that it was done while he was under a hallucination or illusion,[57] but evidence is not admissible to show facts which, even if proved, would furnish no excuse or justification for the homicide,[58] or assault with intent to kill,[59] and the admissibility of evidence of this character is subject to the general rules as to competency.[60] Where the defense is accidental killing, evidence which attempts to in-

(1) Evidence of prior convictions should be admitted in aggravation of the penalty for murder in the first degree only in cases involving professional criminals who are a menace to society and wage war on it for profit and in cases of those who commit murders of a cold-blooded and atrocious nature, and such evidence should be restricted to convictions tending to show that accused is such a person—Commonwealth v Clark, 185 A 761, 322 Pa 321—Commonwealth v Kurutz, 168 A 28, 312 Pa 343—Commonwealth v Williams, 160 A 602, 307 Pa 134

ject into the case the element of self-defense is inadmissible [61] Questions whether the injured person had been indicted or prosecution started against him on the same grounds are immaterial in a trial for assault with intent to murder [62] The state may introduce evidence in rebuttal of evidence of justification [63]

In a prosecution for being an accessary after the fact in a murder, evidence of statements of the killer to the companion of deceased at the time of the tragedy is competent on the question of whether the killing was justifiable or felonious [64]

§ 268. —— Unlawful Character of Act of Deceased

Evidence is admissible to show the unlawful character of the act of deceased in resistance to which the homicide was committed, and also to rebut the accusation that deceased was acting without authority

Evidence tending to show the unlawful character of the act of deceased in resistance to which the homicide was committed,[65] as that the killing was committed in resisting an illegal arrest,[66] is admissible in mitigation of the crime, and such evidence is not incompetent because offered by the state [67] Evidence of the customary practice of deceased while making an arrest is not admissible in the absence of a showing that deceased was in fact attempting to make an arrest [68] Evidence is admissible on behalf of the state to meet the accusation that officers were acting without authority,[69] and to show that the officer had no opportunity to examine the premises after he was shot, and that accused did not ask him whether he had a warrant for his arrest [70] So testimony is admissible to explain the conduct of the officer assaulted or killed,[71] and also to show the necessity for such officer's superior to order him to go to the house of accused in haste [72] In a prosecution for murder committed while accused was attempting to recover animals which deceased was endeavoring to impound, evidence that a stock law prohibiting stock running at large was in force in the county is admissible [73]

§ 269 —— Exercise of Authority or Duty

The accused may introduce evidence tending to show that his acts were in the performance of authority or duty, and in rebuttal the state may show that the killing was not done in the exercise of the accused's authority or duty

Accused may introduce evidence tending to show that his acts were in the performance of authority or duty [74] Thus he may show facts tending to prove that he was trying to arrest deceased [75] A warrant, indorsement, and acts done under it are admissible,[76] although the warrant is insufficient to authorize the arrest[77] Evidence of facts authorizing an arrest without a warrant is admissible in a prosecution for homicide in making such arrest[78] Where accused seeks to show that he, as an officer, was making an arrest for a continuous offense committed partly in his presence, evidence of all facts tending to show the crime is admissible[79] Where the defense was that accused, a peace officer, was in good faith endeavoring to arrest decedent, it was error to exclude evidence of threats made by decedent against accused[80] or evidence tending to show that decedent was a dangerous character,[81] but his reputation among a particular class cannot be shown[82] Evidence of an unauthorized appointment as an officer is inadmissible[83] Where the officer had authority to make arrests outside the city limits, evidence that he knew he was outside the city limits at the time of the homicide or that killing occurred there is not material[84] The accused officer should be allowed to tell what he did, and why[85] Accused, in justification of a killing in making an arrest, is limited to proof of the charges against deceased[86] Details of the acts and conduct on the part of deceased on which the charges were based are incompetent and inadmissible[87] Where the evidence is insufficient to sustain the defense that accused, as a private person, was attempting to make an arrest for a felony, evidence relating to the alleged felony is inadmissible[88] Where the circumstances show a willful murder rather than an attempt to arrest deceased, evidence that accused had a warrant for his arrest is incompetent,[89] and the same principle applies where accused was acting in excess of the authority he claims to have had,[90] or where no such office legally existed as that which he claims to have held,[91] neither can an ordinance which it is not claimed accused was attempting to enforce at the time of the homicide be admitted in evidence[92] On the prosecution of a saloon keeper for an assault with intent to kill, committed in his saloon, an ordinance requiring saloon keepers to give bond to keep an orderly place is not admissible[93] Where accused had a warrant for deceased's arrest, evidence that the warrant was read and explained to him and that he was told what to do under it with reference to the arrest is inadmissible[94] Where there was no evidence that deceased, in attempting to arrest accused, disclosed his authority, and no presumption that accused knew of it, evidence that a year or two before the killing, deceased, with the sheriff, made search for accused is inadmissible, there being nothing to show that accused ever knew of it[95]

In rebuttal the state may show that the killing was not done in the exercise of accused's authority or duty[96] Thus evidence that accused had not au-

Value of material believed stolen

In prosecution for manslaughter against policeman who claimed that he believed a crime was being committed by occupants of Ford coupé which deceased was driving in vicinity of a junk yard when shot by policeman, testimony concerning value of scrap iron, introduced for purpose of showing that policeman could not have had reasonable ground to believe that a felony had been commit-

thority to make the arrest is admissible[97] Where however, defendants contend that they were officers of the law, and killed deceased in overcoming his resistance to the execution of valid process placed in their hands for his arrest on a criminal charge, the state cannot show that deceased was not guilty of the offense charged,[98] and, where a police officer killed one whom he rightfully believed to be an escaping felon, evidence that deceased went to the place where he was killed on lawful business is irrelevant[99] The uncommunicated intention of a constable, authorized to appoint a deputy constable, that a certain appointee should not act in that capacity, is inadmissible in evidence, on trial of the deputy for a homicide committed under color of office, in order to affect the consideration of his official status[1]

§ 270. —— Prevention of Commission of Offense

Evidence tending to show that at the time of the homicide the accused was lawfully engaged in an effort to prevent the commission of a criminal offense by the deceased is admissible, but evidence of facts not shown to be connected with the killing is inadmissible.

Accused is entitled to introduce evidence tending to show that at the time of the homicide he was lawfully engaged in an effort to prevent the commission of a criminal offense by deceased,[2] and, where it is contended for accused that deceased was killed while in the act of committing a felony, evidence of the previous bad character of deceased may be admitted to determine the intent of deceased and the offense of accused[3] Where it is claimed that deceased was killed on being detected in a felony, circumstances tending to show the repeated commission of such a felony by deceased leading up to the detection may be shown[4] Evidence of a conversation between accused and a deputy sheriff a few hours before the killing in which accused sought to ascertain his rights and duties as a watchman is admissible as bearing on his intent and negligence[5] Evidence of facts not shown to be connected with the killing is inadmissible,[6] and evidence that the action of accused who fired into an automobile after the driver failed to stop at his command was the customary method adopted by peace officers in the community is inadmissible.[7]

Where the accused claims that he acted in self-defense, evidence showing any facts legitimately tending to bear out this theory, such as declarations of the deceased, is admissible, but evidence which does not have a tendency to prove the defense, such as the mere opinions of witnesses, or self-serving declarations of the accused, is not admissible Proper rebuttal evidence is admissible

Where accused claims that he acted in self-defense, evidence is admissible to show any facts legitimately tending to bear out this theory,[8] but evidence is not admissible which has no tendency to show that in killing deceased accused acted in defense of his own life or to avoid serious bodily harm[9] When accused admits that he began the attack which resulted in the killing, and offers no evidence tending to prove the facts necessary to revive his right of self-defense, it is competent for the judge, as a preliminary to ruling on the admis-

sibility of evidence, to assume the nonexistence of such facts, even though they bear on the question of guilt or innocence,[10] but where the evidence offered relates to and tends to prove all the facts required, and those facts bear on the question of the guilt or innocence of accused, the question whether such facts are established should be submitted to the jury, together with the evidence, the admissibility of which is dependent on the determination of such question[11] When accused submits a particular act done by deceased at the time of the homicide as evidence of an overt act of dangerous intentions, the act must either be one of such character as would per se be indicative thereof, or it must be shown affirmatively to have been done under circumstances such as to have led reasonably to a belief that it was of that character[12]

The presumption that a willful, intentional killing is murder, as considered supra § 199, does not prevent accused from showing, if he can, that the killing was in self-defense[13]

Declarations Where self-defense is set up, any of the declarations of deceased, explanatory of accompanying acts, are admissible in evidence as part of the res gestæ[14] Self-serving declarations of accused made before the killing with reference to his anticipation of trouble with deceased, his desire to avoid it, and the like are not admissible,[15] nor are exculpatory declarations made by accused after the killing[16]

Opinions The opinions of witnesses at the inquest that accused committed the homicide in necessary self-defense are not competent as direct evidence[17]

Rebuttal Where self-defense is set up the prosecution may introduce evidence in rebuttal[18] The prosecution has even the right to anticipate the defense of self-defense, predicated on the theory that deceased brought on the difficulty, and was in the act of shooting accused when accused fired,[19] or at least the admission of the evidence, before it is shown to be competent, is not cause for reversal unless special injury resulted[20] Evidence which has no tendency to prove that the killing was not done in self-defense and is not otherwise relevant, however, cannot be introduced by the prosecution[21]

§ 272. —— Character and Habits of Deceased

a In general
b Knowledge of accused
c Necessity of claim or showing of self-defense
d Habit of carrying weapons
e. Showing by prosecution of peaceable reputation
f Manner of proving character

a. In General

Where there is evidence tending to show self-defense, or the character of the transaction is in doubt, the reputation of the deceased for violence, turbulence, and bloodthirstiness, as well as his actual character with respect to such matters, can be shown, but the evidence should be confined to the trait of character which is in issue, and his general or moral character should not be inquired into

Where there is evidence tending to show self-defense or the character of the transaction is in doubt, the reputation of deceased for being a violent and dangerous character can be shown for the purpose of showing a reasonable apprehension of immediately impending danger on the part of accused,[22]

particularly under the circumstances prevailing at the time of the homicide,[23] and accused may also show the general reputation of deceased as to using firearms or other deadly weapons when engaged in quarrels.[24] Evidence of the actual character of deceased as well as his reputation regarding turbulence, violence, and similar matters is admissible.[25] Evidence as to the character of deceased should be confined to the trait of character which is in issue,[26] and the inquiry should be limited to his character as a violent and dangerous man,[27] and not extended to embrace his general character,[28] or his moral character,[29] as whether he was honest, or a thief, a gambler, etc.,[30] or other particular traits or characteristics.[31] Evidence as to the unpleasant relations existing between deceased and a particular witness and the latter's unwillingness to work under deceased is not admissible.[32] Even the character of deceased for peace and quiet, not coupled with his character as a violent, dangerous, turbulent, and bloodthirsty man, is not provable by accused.[33] When it is shown that, according to general reputation, deceased was a dangerous and bloodthirsty man, it may be shown further that according to such reputation he would act stealthily and treacherously.[34] It has been held that a mere quarrelsome and fighting character cannot be shown,[35] but there is other authority holding to the contrary,[36] and that,

where particular circumstances, known to accused, are shown to have existed at the time of the homicide, evidence of the reputation of deceased for quarrelsomeness under such conditions is admissible.[37]

Intoxication While evidence of the intoxication of deceased at the time of the difficulty may be admissible, as discussed infra § 278, his habits with reference to being intoxicated cannot be shown[38] where his condition at the time of the homicide is shown,[39] or where, on the other hand, there is no evidence that he had been drinking on the occasion in question.[40]

Subsequent character The general character of the prosecutor as a violent and dangerous man, at a time subsequent to an alleged assault with intent to murder made on him by accused, is immaterial on a trial for the assault.[41]

b. Knowledge of Accused

In order to admit evidence of the violent character of deceased as bearing on the apprehension of danger by the accused, it must appear to have been known to him, consequently evidence of his knowledge of such character is admissible As bearing on the question of who was the aggressor, however, evidence of the character of the deceased is admissible although the accused had no knowledge thereof

It is generally considered to be necessary, in order to admit evidence of the dangerous and violent character of deceased as bearing on the apprehension of danger by accused, that this should appear to have been known to him as otherwise it could not have influenced him,[42] and hence evidence of accused's knowledge of such character is admissible.[43] It has been said that such knowledge is involved in a proposition to prove the general character of deceased for violence, for if it is proved that his general character in this respect was bad it would reasonably appear that accused knew this as well as others,[44] although the rule does not apply to decedent's reputation at other times and places than that of his killing where no overt act of deceased has been shown,[45] but, on the other hand, there is authority holding it proper to exclude what the neighborhood believed, limiting the issue to what accused had heard and believed.[46] As bearing on the question of who was the aggressor, however, it is not essential that accused shall have had knowledge of the character of deceased to permit proof thereof.[47] Where no evidence has been introduced as to the violent character of deceased, a question asked of accused as to whether he knew that deceased was a bloodthirsty, violent man is properly excluded.[48]

c. Necessity of Claim or Showing of Self-Defense

Evidence of the violent and dangerous character of the decedent is inadmissible unless there is a claim of self-defense supported by evidence of some overt act or hostile demonstration on the part of the decedent or one of his confederates, and consequently such evidence is not admissible where it appears that the accused provoked the difficulty, or was in no danger, or did not believe himself to be in danger, or did not avoid the difficulty when he might safely have done so, or where he claims the killing was accidental, or denies that he killed the deceased

In order that evidence of the violent and dangerous character of deceased or the person assaulted may be admissible, there must be a claim of self-defense, supported by some evidence.[49] It is within the discretion of the trial judge to determine when a proper foundation is laid,[50] which, according to some authorities, may consist in the testimony of accused alone,[51] but according to other authorities the unsupported statement of accused is insufficient.[52] There must be evidence of some overt act or hostile demonstration on the part of deceased[53] or one of his confederates[54] of such character as would per se be indicative of dangerous intentions,[55] or it must be shown affirmatively to have been done under circumstances such as reasonably to have led to a belief that it was of that character.[56] Evidence of the dangerous and violent character of deceased is not admissible where, at the time such evidence is offered, it appears from the evidence already introduced that accused provoked the difficulty,[57] or was the assailant,[58] where he was in no danger of loss of life or serious bodily harm,[59] or did not believe himself to be in such danger,[60] or there was nothing to excite the fears of a reasonable man that such danger existed,[61] where he did not retreat while he might safely have done so,[62] where deceased was retreating or running away from accused at the time of the killing,[63] or had declined further to combat before the fatal shot was fired,[64] or where it is claimed that the killing was accidental,[65] or accused denies that he killed deceased.[66] to the accused; and where such a showing is made evidence is admissible to rebut it.

While there is authority apparently to the contrary, based on the rule that an accused may prove the general reputation of deceased for being a violent or turbulent person, but not his reputation for committing any particular unlawful act,[67] the general rule is that, where the evidence tends to show that accused might have acted in self-defense, evidence is admissible to show that deceased was in the habit of carrying firearms or other deadly weapons or that he had the reputation of habitually being armed.[68] It must, of course, be made to appear that such habit or reputation of deceased was known to accused, as otherwise it could not have influenced his conduct,[69] and evidence showing such knowledge is admissible,[70] but it has been held that if it was generally known that deceased was in the habit of carrying firearms it is reasonable to assume that accused knew of that habit as well as others,[71] although there is no such presumption where accused and decedent live a considerable distance apart.[72] Where there is no claim or evidence that the killing was done in self-defense, evidence of deceased's habit of going armed is inadmissible.[73] Where an unfriendly feeling existed between accused and deceased for several months before the homicide, it was error to limit evidence of the fact of deceased's carrying arms to a short period preceding the tragedy,[74] but what deceased said months prior to the homicide with regard to his carrying firearms is not admissible on a question of self-defense.[75] Since a gun is a weapon not readily hidden about the person, evidence as to the reputation of deceased as to carrying a gun is immaterial, as, even if accused knew of the habit of deceased to carry a gun, he might readily see that deceased had none with him at the time of the difficulty.[76]

In rebuttal the prosecution may introduce evidence to show that deceased was not in the habit of carrying weapons,[77] or that he was never known to use weapons of any sort in any of his fights, either as boy or man,[78] but it is held that where there is testimony tending to show that deceased was making a move as though to draw a pistol, evidence that he was not in the habit of carrying a pistol is incompetent.[79]

Although such evidence cannot be introduced by the state in the first instance, rebuttal evidence showing the deceased to have had, at the time of the homicide, the reputation of being a quiet and peaceable individual is admissible where the accused has set up self-defense and introduced evidence tending to show the turbulent and violent character of the deceased, and such evidence is also admissible under express authority of some statutes where there is evidence of threats made by the deceased

The state is entitled to show the good reputation of deceased, where such reputation has been put in issue by accused.[80] Where accused has set up self-defense and introduced evidence tending to show the turbulent, violent, and quarrelsome character of deceased it is competent for the prosecution in rebuttal to introduce evidence showing the reputation of deceased to have been that he was of a quiet and peaceable character,[81] limiting such inquiry, however, to the general character of deceased as a quiet, peaceable man, or as a violent or dangerous one,[82] but it has been held that the prosecution cannot in the first instance and as a part of its case, before anything as to deceased's character has been shown by accused, introduce evidence showing deceased to have been quiet and peaceable.[83] Within this rule, evidence of the acts of deceased constituting part of the res gestæ and showing him to be a dangerous man does not authorize the production of evidence by the state on his reputation for being quiet and peaceful.[84] Testimony by accused, brought out on the state's cross-examination only, is not sufficient basis for such evidence on behalf of the state.[85] There is, however, authority for the view that a plea of self-defense and evidence in support thereof, showing an attack by deceased, is sufficient to let in evidence by the prosecution that deceased was peaceable and quiet, although accused has not attacked his general character in this respect.[86]

Where accused in murder prosecution offered evidence that deceased was dangerous fighting man, state's

Under some statutes, evidence of the peaceable character of deceased is admissible where there is evidence of threats made by him,[87] except where the threats are part and parcel of the immediate difficulty,[88] but the privilege of the state extends no further than the statute provides,[89] and the state cannot introduce such evidence in the first instance before the introduction by accused of evidence relative to the character of deceased or threats by him.[90]

It is the character of deceased for peace and quietude at the time of the homicide which is the subject of inquiry,[91] but much is left to the discretion of the court as to the time covered by such testimony.[92]

f. Manner of Proving Character

As a general rule, evidence of the character of the deceased or assaulted person must be confined to his general reputation in the community within a reasonable time of the alleged crime, and evidence of particular acts of violence or lawlessness is inadmissible unless they were directly connected with the crime charged. In some, but not in all, jurisdictions proof of conviction of crimes of violence is admissible. The state may introduce competent evidence in rebuttal.

As a general rule the evidence of the character of deceased must be confined to his general reputation, and evidence of particular acts of violence or lawlessness is inadmissible,[93] unless they were di-evidence on rebuttal of deceased's reputation as fair fighter was admissible.—Daugherty v. State, 139 So. 439, 24 Ala. App. 591.

What amounts to attack on character.

(1) Accused may attack a deceased person's reputation by his own testimony, as well as by the testimony of others, as respects the state's right to rebut such attack by evidence of deceased's good character and accused's testimony that he had heard that deceased was a dangerous man and knew that his own life was in danger from deceased made such rebuttal proper.—Ray v. State, 124 S.W.2d 119, 136 Tex.Cr. 246.

(2) Evidence of specific acts of deceased, when admissible, tending to show his violent and dangerous character, authorizes the state, on rebuttal, to show his general reputation in such regard to be good.—State v. Todd, 214 P. 899, 28 N.M. 518.

(3) Other illustrations see 30 C.J. p. 232 note 40 [e].

Opinion and personal observation.

Where witnesses in murder prosecution qualified under proper questions to testify concerning deceased's reputation as a peaceable citizen, objection that such witnesses testified from their own opinion and personal observation went to the weight rather than admissibility of their testimony.—Ray v. State, 124 S.W.2d 119, 136 Tex.Cr. 246.

30 C.J. p. 232 note 42.

(1) Evidence that an insulting proposal by deceased to accused's wife and daughter was communicated to him the night before the homicide did not entitle the state to show the good character of deceased.—Webster v. State, 93 So. 545, 207 Ala. 668.

(2) So evidence of deceased's reputation as peaceable citizen is not admissible merely because accused has interposed plea of self-defense and offered evidence that deceased was aggressor.—Miller v. State, 72 P.2d 520, 63 Okl.Cr. 64.—Coulson v. State, 291 P. 152, 48 Okl.Cr. 206.

rectly connected with, and involved in, the homicide,[94] especially where accused had no knowledge of, and was not concerned in, such acts,[95] but, on cross-examination of a witness for the prosecution who has testified as to deceased's good character, testimony of particular facts tending to show his character to have been otherwise may be elicited as going to discredit the witness,[96] and some authorities hold that specific acts of violence by deceased, known to accused prior to the homicide, may be shown,[97] although it is not error to refuse to permit accused to testify of what he has heard, concerning such acts, from others unless such acts are so closely connected with the homicide as to be a part of the res gestæ.[98] It is held on the one hand that information conveyed to accused before the killing that deceased was a violent and turbulent man, and accustomed to go about armed, is admissible whether the informant gained his knowledge from the general reputation of deceased or from personal observation of his specific acts,[99] or from other sources,[1] and, on the other, that evidence as to the character of deceased should be based on his general reputation rather than on the observation of the witness.[2] A witness may have sufficient knowledge of decedent's reputation to testify with reference thereto without having had a personal acquaintance with him.[3] Evidence irrelevant to the issues on which it is offered and tending to discredit the character of deceased should be excluded.[4] Evidence of the temper of the person assaulted is not proper to show his reputation for violence and bloodthirstiness.[5]

Place and time. Evidence of the reputation of deceased should relate to the community in which he lived,[6] and to some reasonable time previous to,

In murder case, witness who knew deceased, knew others who knew him, and knew his reputation for quietude, may state what that reputation was without preliminary examination. So hotel keeper, acquainted with deceased, who saw him about twice in neighborhood knew people who knew him and discussed his character with various people, may state deceased's reputation for quietude, and witness well acquainted with deceased may testify to deceased's reputation for quietude without showing that he knew any one who knew deceased—People v Alpine 254 P 281, 81 Cal App 456

(2) Testimony showing truth or falsity of statements by deceased to accused regarding specific acts of violence by deceased toward others was inadmissible where accused did not have knowledge of such acts of violence prior to homicide, other than deceased's statements—Brock v State, 32 P 2d 88, 55 Okl Cr 410

dence admissible.[48] It is not permissible to show the reputation of deceased's family for violence.[49]

§ 275. —— Previous Quarrels, Ill Feeling, or Hostile Acts

Evidence of ill feeling or hostile acts on the part of the deceased toward the accused or of previous difficulties between them is admissible where the issue of self-defense is in the case and there is a connection between the previous difficulties and the crime charged, and evidence of difficulties with, or specific acts of violence by the deceased against, third persons may, in the discretion of the court, be admitted if the accused knew of the circumstances prior to the alleged crime, but details of prior difficulties are generally inadmissible. The accused's evidence is subject to rebuttal.

Where there is a claim supported by some evidence of self-defense,[50] or, as it has been well stated, where the proof justifies the giving of a charge on the law of self-defense,[51] accused may for the purpose of showing deceased to have been the aggressor, and the killing to have been necessary in self-defense, introduce evidence tending to show that deceased entertained hostile feelings toward him.[52] Thus he may show that there had been previous difficulties or quarrels between himself and deceased,[53] or the person assaulted,[54] and the cause of such difficulties,[55] explaining his own reason for being at the place where the difficulty occurred.[56] So, too, accused may show that previous to the killing deceased had been guilty of acts and conduct evincing hostility toward accused,[57] or of conduct which would tend to explain the motive of deceased in acting as the aggressor.[58] A previous quarrel between decedent and another concerning accused is admissible where it tends to confirm accused's story of the killing.[59] Mere declarations of deceased which do not show hostility may be excluded,[60] and an indictment returned at a former term charging deceased with the offense of shooting at accused is properly excluded as without probative value.[61]

On the question whether specific acts of violence have a relevancy independent of the general reputation of deceased, the authorities seem to be in a state of hopeless confusion, announcing rules ranging from that denying proof of specific acts of violence on the part of the deceased under any circumstances to the other extreme of holding such evidence admissible under all circumstances.[62] Generally accused may show that on former occasions deceased assaulted or attacked,[63] beat,[64] waylaid,[65] or shot at[66] him, but, on the other hand, it has been held that accused may not show that deceased had beaten him[67] Previous specific acts of violence by decedent toward accused and others in his presence, may be shown[68]

While evidence of disconnected difficulties of deceased with third persons has been held incompetent in several cases,[69] this rule cannot apply to proof of a mental condition which would continue down to the time of the event under investigation and enter thereinto, as bearing on the question as to who was the probable aggressor,[70] and accordingly, if the circumstances were known to accused prior to the assault or homicide, the courts, in the exercise of reasonable discretion,[71] frequently hold such evidence admissible,[72] the admissibility in each case being determined on the facts of the individual case,[73] and the evidence being properly rejected where the acts were not so closely connected in point of time or occasion with the homicide as reasonably to indicate decedent's state of mind at the time of the homicide, or to produce apprehension of great bodily harm on the part of accused[74] So it has been held that accused cannot testify as to statements of deceased as to difficulties he had had with third persons[75] Testimony that deceased had been in trouble prior to the shooting is inadmissible, however, where the character of the alleged trouble was not shown,[76] evidence of specific acts of misconduct not shown to have a tendency to characterize deceased as a violent or dangerous man is not admissible[77] Specific acts of violence not known to accused prior to the homicide ordinarily cannot be shown in evidence,[78] although it has been held that if such acts relate to the same transaction, or reflect on the conduct or motives of the persons involved, and the aggressor's identity is doubtful, the evidence is admissible[79] Information to accused of other such acts by decedent may be shown[80]

common hostile purpose, are held admissible in favor of accused for the same purpose and under the same limitations as evidence of specific acts of violence of decedent[81] Thus, in a prosecution of an officer for killing a striker, evidence of conduct of, and assaults by, other strikers is admissible to show the condition of accused's mind[82] Such evidence, however, may be inadmissible for remoteness,[83] or, it has been held, for lack of evidence of the connection of deceased therewith[84]

Testimony pertaining to prior difficulties between accused and third persons wholly disconnected with the homicide in question is inadmissible as bearing on the question of self-defense,[85] although it has been held that where there is evidence that deceased and his companions were the aggressors, evidence showing bias or ill will of deceased's companions toward accused is admissible[86]

Necessity of issue of self-defense Where the law of self-defense is not in the case, evidence of the hostile feelings[87] or acts of deceased,[88] or of previous quarrels,[89] is irrelevant and inadmissible Where there was no danger, evidence of prior difficulties is inadmissible on the issue of quantum of punishment[90] Where the evidence showed without contradiction that accused was the aggressor, evidence that deceased was the aggressor in a former difficulty is inadmissible[91]

Connection with homicide There must be some connection between the previous difficulties and the homicide,[92] accused cannot go back to a remote period and prove a particular quarrel or grudge unless he also proves a continued difference flowing from that source,[93] but where there has been a series of difficulties down to the time of the killing accused may introduce evidence of previous affrays, difficulties, and attacks, although remote in time and place, the weight thereof being for the jury[94]

Details While it has been held that the details of the former difficulty are admissible to show who was the aggressor therein,[95] the general rule is that the details or particulars of the former difficulty cannot be shown[96] where they are in no manner connected with the homicide,[97] but this rule does not prevent the introduction of facts which show the general nature and gravity of the former difficulty or disagreement between the parties,[98] as that

Under evidence that deceased came toward accused with two bricks in hands during argument on day of murder, testimony as to how many times deceased ordered accused off weapons were used[99] The trial court is allowed a latitude of discretion in determining whether evidence as to previous quarrels and assaults relates to mere details or to a matter of substance[1]

Rebuttal The prosecution may prove that the hostile feeling was on the part of accused rather than of deceased,[2] or may contradict accused's statement that ill feeling existed between him and deceased,[3] and may prove that deceased did not assault accused,[4] for that purpose showing what did occur at the time referred to in accused's evidence[5] All the facts leading up to the killing, including a previous fight between the persons involved, may be shown[6] Where the victim was the husband of accused, and the defense was that accused was compelled to kill in self-defense against the attack of deceased, testimony tending to show accused's illicit relations with another some years prior to the killing is inadmissible, such infidelity not depriving accused of her right of self-defense against violence offered by deceased immediately prior to the killing[7] In a prosecution for murder growing out of an attempt to serve process, where the defense was self-defense, and accused introduced proof that decedent had committed a crime, and that the result of serving such process would be to place in the hands of the officers the evidence of such offense, the state's rebuttal is limited to such evidence as decedent could have introduced in his defense had he been on trial for the offense.[8] Where the state has introduced evidence of friendly relations between accused and the person assaulted or killed, the refusal to permit accused to contradict such evidence is error.[9]

Admissibility of all threats made

(1) Refusal to admit all threats and previous manifestations of hostility by deceased against accused was error, where there was recent declaration of reformation by deceased and it became material point for decision whether that declaration of reformation was in good faith, and whether accused would be justified in disbelief of good faith thereof —Hendrix v State, 161 So 151, 172 Miss 589

(2) In homicide prosecution, the fact that testimony as to threats against accused by deceased had been adduced on issue of self-defense would not preclude introduction of testimony of other witnesses as to

was the aggressor,[11] to throw light on accused's motive and show whether in killing deceased or in making the assault with which he is charged he was actuated by malice or acted in the belief that it was necessary to take life to preserve his own life or save himself from serious bodily harm,[12] and as relevant to the question whether accused had reasonable cause to apprehend an attack fatal to life or fraught with peril of great bodily injury, and hence was justified in acting on a hostile demonstration of less pronounced character than would have justified his act if such threats had not preceded it,[13] but for no other purposes.[14] Evidence of threats must be otherwise competent[15] and should specify the occasion,[16] the person making them,[17] the time when they were made,[18] and the character of the threats[19] or the words used.[20] Threats by deceased may be too remote in time to be relevant,[21] but evidence of threats is not to be excluded for remoteness if the court can see that they would legitimately affect accused's apprehensions,[22] and generally the remoteness affects only the weight of the evidence.[23] There is no error in excluding evidence of threats at a remote time when there is uncontradicted evidence of recent threats.[24] Evidence of the communication of such threats to accused is admissible[25] without preliminary proof that the threats had in fact been made,[26] and may be given by any person who heard the communication,[27] but any advice or warning given him at the time of the communication should be excluded.[28] The method of communication is immaterial, the material point being the fact of communication.[29] An offer to prove the repetition by another to the prisoner of a threat by deceased to a prisoner charged with murder is properly excluded where there is no suggestion that the prisoner did not hear the threat when made, or that he had forgotten it[30] The partial execution of threats made may be shown[31] In corroboration of evidence of threats by deceased against accused, which has been contradicted by evidence of amicable relations between their respective families, accused may show threats against other members of his family by deceased[32]

b. Nature of Threats

In order that alleged threats be provable, they must have been actual threats to do serious harm made by deceased or reported to accused as such, and generally they must have been directed against accused, but the mere fact that the threats were conditional or were made indirectly does not make them inadmissible Significant surrounding circumstances may be shown, and evidence corroborating the evidence of threats is admissible

In order that alleged threats may be provable in favor of accused they must have been actual threats made by deceased or must at least have been reported to accused as actual threats coming from deceased[33] The threats must have been of a nature to show the intention or desire of deceased to take accused's life,[34] or at least to do him serious bodily harm[35] The fact that threats of deceased were to a certain degree conditional does not render them inadmissible,[36] even though the event on which the condition is based has not transpired[37] The fact that the threats were made indirectly or by innuendo does not make proof of them irrelevant[38] Statements in the presence of deceased as to his prospective action, to which he did not dissent, have been held admissible[39] The fact that threats are vague and indefinite is held no bar to their admission,[40] but the opposite view is also maintained[41]

Direction against accused It has been held that, in order to show deceased's motive or state of mind, evidence of threats of deceased are admissible although they are not actually directed against accused,[42] or are directed against third persons,[43] but as a general rule, the threats must have been directed against accused,[44] and mere impersonal threats are not admissible[45] However, it is not necessary that accused should have been named in the threats, it being sufficient if the circumstances show that he was the person against whom they were directed,[46] and evidence of threats against a class to which accused belongs is admissible, it being for the jury to determine whether they were made against accused[47] Evidence of general threats against any person found in a certain situation or attempting to do certain things is admissible where it appears that deceased found accused within the scope of the threats [48]

Accompanying circumstances Deceased's attitude and manner in making the threat may be shown,[49] and other significant surrounding circumstances,[50] although particular circumstances unknown to accused may be immaterial [51] Other parts of the conversation which would aid accused in judging the weight to be given to threats are held admissible,[52] but it is held, on the other hand, that the details of the conversation between witness and decedent are inadmissible [53]

Corroboration Evidence that deceased or the person assaulted waylaid accused is admissible to corroborate evidence of threats against accused [54]

c. Necessity of Claim or Showing of Self-Defense

In order that evidence of threats of the person killed or assaulted against accused may be admissible, the law of self-defense must be in the case.

In order that evidence of threats of deceased against accused may be admissible, the law of self-defense must be in the case, that is to say, there must be a claim on the part of accused that the killing was necessary to prevent the loss of his own life or serious bodily injury to himself through deceased, and some evidence in support of such claim, or as it has been expressed, there must have been some overt act on the part of deceased [55] The same rule applies in a prosecution for assault with intent to kill or murder as to evidence of threats by the person assaulted [56] Evidence of such threats is not admissible where accused was the aggressor or assailant in the difficulty in which the killing occurred,[57] where accused brought on or sought the difficulty,[58] where the combat was mutual,[59] where deceased was fleeing from accused at the time,[60] where accused was in no danger at the time,[61] or

In prosecution for manslaughter where deceased was the aggressor but, after accused's first shot, which missed, deceased raised his hands and said "I give," but accused fired two more shots which struck deceased, there was no evidence tending to show that killing was in self-defense, and exclusion of uncommunicated threats by deceased against accused was not error—State v Vernon, 2 So 2d 629, 197 La. 867.

had no reason to believe himself to be in danger,[62] where there was nothing sufficient to justify accused in believing that deceased was about to carry out his threats,[63] where accused could have avoided killing deceased,[64] or where accused waylaid and killed deceased,[65] but evidence of threats should not be excluded on the ground that accused was the aggressor, where his evidence sustains the theory that he did nothing except what he had a right to do at the opening of the difficulty.[66] In some jurisdictions the court is vested with discretion to determine the sufficiency of the evidence to show an overt act on the part of deceased,[67] and it is said there must be not merely evidence, but proof, of an overt act to justify the admission of threats.[68] Other authorities hold that, where the evidence does not authorize the conclusion that there was nothing in the conduct of deceased to induce the belief of a purpose to execute his threat, accused should be given the benefit of the rule applicable to previous threats communicated to him.[69] The sufficiency of the testimony of accused as a foundation for evidence of threats has been sustained,[70] but other authorities hold the statement of accused insufficient for this purpose,[71] even though sworn.[72]

d. Necessity of Communication of Threats to Accused

Although as a general rule evidence of uncommunicated threats of deceased against defendant is not admissible, such evidence may be admitted to show that deceased was probably the aggressor and to corroborate evidence of communicated threats

It has been laid down as a general rule that threats of deceased against accused are not admissible in evidence unless such threats were communicated to accused before the homicide,[73] but there are important modifications of this rule. Thus in case the evidence leaves it doubtful as to whether or not deceased was the aggressor in the difficulty in which the killing occurred as claimed by accused, evidence of threats of deceased against accused, even though not communicated to him, tends to show deceased's animus toward accused and bears on the probability of his having been the aggressor, and hence is admissible for this purpose,[74] and evidence of uncommunicated threats is also admis-

sible when accompanied by proof of threats which have been communicated to accused, as such evidence corroborates the communicated threats and tends to establish the reality of the peril in which accused considered himself to be at the time of the killing[75] Evidence of uncommunicated threats of deceased shortly before the killing, together with acts and conduct indicating an intention to put the threats into execution, may be admissible as part of the res gestæ[76] Although it has been stated broadly that, when the issue of self-defense is presented, threats of deceased are admissible whether communicated or not,[77] other authorities hold them inadmissible when not relevant for the purposes or under the conditions just stated[78]

e. Rebuttal of Evidence of Threats

Any relevant and material facts and circumstances tending to discredit evidence of threats by deceased may be proved in rebuttal

The prosecution may prove any relevant and material facts and circumstances tending to discredit evidence of threats by deceased,[79] or tending to show that they were of such character, or came from such a source, as not to be the basis of a well grounded apprehension of danger in the mind of accused,[80] as, that the threats were mere idle talk,[81] or that deceased did not intend to execute or had abandoned any intention of executing them,[82] at least, where the threats were uncommunicated,[83] although it has been held that evidence of a statement, made by deceased but not communicated to accused, that he did not want any more trouble with accused, is inadmissible[84] Evidence of dishonest conduct of accused toward deceased is inadmissible in explanation of threats of the latter[85]

§ 277. —— Threats of Third Persons against Defendant

Evidence of threats of third persons against accused is generally irrelevant and inadmissible, although the circumstances of the particular case may be such as to render such evidence admissible.

Evidence of threats of third persons against accused is, as a rule, irrelevant and inadmissible,[86] until it is shown that accused had reasonable ground to believe that such third person was acting with decedent in a common design to injure or kill accused[87] The rule is particularly applicable when the threats are uncommunicated to accused,[88] but it has been held that threatening statements made by associates of deceased shortly before the fatal encounter, although not communicated to accused, are admissible in evidence together with threats of deceased to show the state of mind of deceased and his associates, and to characterize the conduct of deceased[89] Communicated threats of a third person are admissible to show the state of mind of accused at the time of the homicide where they shed light on his interpretation of the conduct of deceased and there is other evidence that accused had reason to believe that his life was in danger[90] Thus, where accused contends that the difficulty was brought on by one who was acting with deceased, evidence of previous threats by such a one is admissible,[91] and, where deceased and the third

§ 278. —— Imminence and Apprehension of Danger

b Physical characteristics of parties
d Intoxication of deceased

a. In General

Relevant evidence of any fact legitimately tending to show the imminence of the danger to accused of loss of life or serious bodily injury at the time he acted, together with his apprehension of danger and the reasonableness thereof is admissible, and in rebuttal the prosecution may show that accused had no reasonable grounds to apprehend that there was any imminent danger to him

Accused, in order to support his claim of self-defense may introduce evidence of any fact legitimately tending to show the imminence of the danger to himself of loss of life or serious bodily injury at the time he acted,[93] together with his apprehension of danger,[94] the reasonableness thereof,[95] and the reasonableness of his belief that the means or force employed in self-defense was necessary [96] The evidence must, of course, be relevant,[97] and must relate to the time of the assault [98] Accused may testify as to his belief that his life was in danger,[99] although an overt act by deceased must have been shown[1] and there must have been reasonable cause for that belief [2] Accused's exclamations indicating fear of a crowd of whom deceased was one are competent as tending to show his state of mind with reference to deceased [3] Where statements or exclamations of accused are admitted, details thereof not necessary to show his state of mind should be excluded [4] Previous acts or declarations of accused, offered to show his fear of deceased, not constituting part of the res gestæ, are inadmissible [5] A fortiori, where evidence of precautions taken by accused is admitted, the exclusion of his reasons therefor is not error [6] Facts not known to accused are not admissible to show his apprehension of danger [7] Evidence that accused was a person of nervous temperament and constantly apprehensive that attacks would be made on him is not admissible [8]

The opinion of a witness as to the intention of deceased in approaching accused and as to danger of accused is not admissible [9]

Warnings to accused against deceased, without any showing that they were based on acts or conduct of the latter, are inadmissible [10]

Danger from others The evidence must be confined to danger from the acts of deceased, and accused cannot show that he was in danger from other people, as this has no proper bearing on his act in killing deceased,[11] but a continuous course of conduct by a body of persons with whom deceased was associated at the time of the killing may be shown to prove that such persons, and not defendants, were the aggressors [12]

Effect on third person The effect produced on a bystander by the conduct of deceased may be shown as illustrating the effect likely to be produced on accused,[13] but evidence as to how the appearance and manner of deceased would impress a stranger or one who had but slight acquaintance with him is not admissible [14] Evidence that a witness carried a pistol because he had heard of a prior difficulty between accused and deceased, and was afraid of deceased, is not admissible [15]

In rebuttal the prosecution may show that accused had no reasonable grounds to apprehend that there was any imminent danger to him,[16] but not, in distinction therefrom, that there was not in fact any danger [17]

b. Physical Characteristics of Parties

Where self-defense is the plea, evidence of the physical characteristics of deceased or assaulted party is admissible [18] Accordingly, as bearing on the imminence of the danger to accused, accused may show that deceased was a larger and stronger man than himself,[19] and that accused was weak and enfeebled from disease,[20] or that he was crippled,[21] or that accused was pregnant, of which fact deceased had knowledge [22] The relative strength must be proved by reputation, and not by the opinions of witnesses[23] or proof of specific acts of strength [24] Such evidence should be confined to the time of the homicide [25] Evidence as to the reason of accused's not being robust is not admissible [26] Where the entire encounter was with weapons and neither party used direct bodily force against the other, it has been held that evidence of the weight and height of deceased was not material to any issue in the case [27] On the other hand, it is competent for the prosecution to show that there was not such disparity in the size and strength of the two men as to induce accused to believe himself in greater peril in consequence of such disparity,[28] or that accused was the larger and stronger of the two,[29] or that deceased was deformed[30] or seriously crippled,[31] or was a weak, delicate man,[32] or was partially blind,[33] or had recently been ill,[34] or was physically unable to pursue, kill, or dangerously injure accused,[35] but the prosecution cannot show that deceased, by reason of some accident or injury, was not as strong as he appeared, when accused did not know of this[36]

c. Possession and Use of Weapons by Deceased

Evidence is admissible on behalf of accused to show that deceased was armed and that in the difficulty with accused he used or attempted to use deadly weapons, but such evidence is subject to rebuttal

As bearing on the question of self-defense and as tending to support the contention of accused that at the time of the killing he acted under a well grounded apprehension of loss of life or serious bodily injury to himself through deceased, evidence is admissible to show that at the time of the difficulty in which the killing occurred deceased was armed, and that in such difficulty he used or attempted to use deadly weapons,[37] and that accused had previously been informed that deceased was armed[38] It is held that evidence as to possession by deceased of a weapon at a time previous to the homicide is not admissible,[39] at least in the absence of knowledge on the part of accused[40] or proof that the carrying of the weapons had any relation or reference to accused,[41] especially when such possession was before any difficulty between the parties,[42] but that such evidence is admissible if knowledge of such possession is brought home to accused[43] On the other hand, it has been held permissible to prove that deceased was armed just prior to the fatal difficulty[44] It may be shown that weapons such as accused claims deceased or the person assaulted had were found at or near the place of the encounter or near the body of deceased,[45] that in the difficulty accused received a wound apparently made with a deadly weapon,[46] or that after the difficulty there were cuts in his clothes which were not there before[47] It is not permissible, however, to introduce evidence as to whether deceased had a license to carry a pistol,[48] or as to declarations of deceased that he owned a pistol,[49] or declarations of a bystander,[50] or that a few moments before the homicide deceased attempted to borrow a larger pistol than the one he had,[51] or that he drew a weapon after receiving the mortal wound from accused,[52] or with reference to a weapon other than that alleged to have been used by deceased[53] So testimony showing that on the morning of the homicide deceased had refused to lend his pistol to another party, saying that he was going to need it, is inadmissible in the absence of a showing that deceased expected or intended trouble with accused[54] In the absence of an attempt to prove that deceased was in the habit of going armed, or that defendants knew of any such habit, questions to a witness whether he ever saw deceased with pistols or knew anything about his carrying a pistol were properly excluded.[55] Where accused testified that decedent assaulted him with a pistol, and the state gave evidence that decedent did not have or own a pistol, accused could show that decedent owned a pistol at or near the time of the difficulty.[56] Evidence of the possession and preparation of a weapon is not admissible before other evidence of a justification.[57]

In rebuttal the prosecution may introduce evidence legitimately tending to show that deceased or assaulted party was not armed at the time of the difficulty,[58] that he did not have any such weapon as accused claims he used or sought to use,[59] that he had no weapon in his hand,[60] that accused's father had a pistol similar to one found on the ground near the scene of the difficulty and alleged to have been carried by deceased,[61] that deceased did not use a weapon which he had,[62] or that his possession of a weapon was not because of any hostile intention,[63] and that accused did not act under an impression that it was,[64] but testimony as to what deceased's wife said or did to establish that her husband had no weapon at the time of the difficulty is not competent,[65] and it has been held error to admit evidence to show the innocent purpose of deceased in acquiring a weapon without showing communication of such purpose to accused.[66] Evidence of threats against the life of deceased, made by persons other than accused, but who had a grudge against deceased in common with accused, and which threats the witness communicated to deceased, is admissible against accused to show a motive on the part of deceased in carrying a rifle at the time of the homicide.[67] Evidence that a firearm carried by deceased could not be discharged is not admissible, however, where knowledge of the defect is not brought home to accused,[68] nor can the prosecution show that deceased's gun was load-

Circumstantial evidence

(3) Testimony that the body of deceased or the person of the assaulted party was searched shortly after the alleged crime, and that no weapons were found is admissible.

Earlier use by accused

In murder prosecution wherein accused pleaded self-defense, in that decedent threatened him with a shotgun, permitting witness to testify that on morning preceding murder accused, after shooting birds with the gun, had placed it in decedent's room where it was found near the

ed with small shot when it is not shown that accused knew this [69] On a trial for assault with intent to murder, evidence that after the assault the prosecutor carried arms for the avowed purpose of shooting accused is immaterial [70] Evidence that deceased did not have a particular weapon exhibited to the jury is incompetent [71] Testimony on behalf of the prosecution that witness saw another knife in deceased's possession but not the one in question is immaterial [72] Evidence of the habit [73] and declarations [74] of deceased is inadmissible, except that his declarations as to carrying arms made in the presence of, and to, accused, are admissible [75] The state has been permitted to show, however, that deceased, who stated soon after being shot that his pistol was empty, had, earlier in the evening, discharged his pistol a number of times and showed its empty cylinder to companions and stated that he had emptied it [76]

The intoxication of deceased at the time of the fatal difficulty may be shown provided there is some evidence in the case on the issue of self-defense, and the state may introduce evidence in rebuttal.

On the issue of self-defense the intoxicated condition of deceased at the time of the fatal difficulty may be shown,[77] but such evidence is inadmissible when offered before there is any evidence as to the question of self-defense,[78] or when all the evidence introduced shows that accused was the aggressor,[79] or when the time of the intoxication was too remote to affect the mental state of the person killed or assaulted at the time of the alleged crime [80] The state may introduce competent evidence in rebuttal to disprove the intoxication of deceased [81]

§ 279. —— Facts Unknown to Defendant

Facts unknown to accused at the time of the homicide cannot ordinarily be shown by either the defense or the prosecution

As a general rule, facts unknown to accused at the time of the homicide cannot be shown by either the defense[82] or the prosecution,[83] as such facts could not have influenced his action Where the meeting between accused and deceased is accidental, or is brought about by deceased, evidence of an innocent motive of deceased for being at the place of the fatal encounter, unknown to accused, is inadmissible,[84] but, where accused went where he knew he would meet or be likely to meet deceased, the admission of such evidence is not error [85]

§ 280. —— Other Particular Matters to Sustain Right

Evidence of particular matters, conditions, or occurrences which legitimately tends to sustain accused's contention that the killing or assault was perpetrated in self-defense is admissible

Among particular items admissible, in accordance with the general rule, to sustain the right of self-defense, in addition to those already enumerated supra §§ 272-279, are the facts that accused endeavored to avoid meeting deceased,[86] that he avoided rather than sought the difficulty in which deceased was killed,[87] that he had no intention of provoking any difficulty,[88] that deceased brought on the difficulty or was the aggressor therein,[89] that deceased appeared angry just before the fatal encounter and when overtaking accused on the street,[90] that deceased was dangerously insane,[91] that accused was in good faith attempting to retreat,[92] that he was in such a place that he could not retreat out of the reach of deceased and thus escape his attack,[93] that it was accused's intention merely to hurt or repel and not to kill deceased,[94] or that there was a conspiracy between deceased and others to take accused's life.[95] Evidence is also admissible which tends to show the character of the attack which accused resisted,[96] the purpose and attitude of deceased at the time,[97] or of the person assaulted,[98] the motive of deceased to attack accused,[99] the extent of the injuries received by accused in the combat,[1] and the time when and place where they were inflicted.[2] Evidence that accused was rightfully at the scene of the combat[3] or that he was looking for deceased to have a peaceful adjustment of a prior difficulty[4] is also admissible. So it may be relevant to show adulterous intimacies between deceased wife of accused and another, causing accused to order her to leave his home,[5] intimacies between deceased and accused's wife[6] or daughter,[7] and that accused had heard rumors that deceased had been bragging of such intimacies,[8] but on the other hand, it has been held that evidence that deceased told a witness that he had had intercourse with the wife of accused is inadmissible.[9] Evidence is not admissible, for the purpose of showing self-defense, that accused had been attacked by third persons with murderous weapons just before he killed deceased, in the absence of any evidence showing a conspiracy between such third persons and de-

§ 281. —— Particular Evidence to Rebut Right

Evidence of particular matters which legitimately tends to rebut contention of accused that the killing or assault was perpetrated in self-defense is admissible

In rebuttal of evidence of the right of self-defense, in accordance with the general rule stated supra § 271, the courts have held admissible, in addition to the matters heretofore set out, evidence on behalf of the prosecution which tends to show that deceased was not the aggressor,[13] that accused was the aggressor,[14] that accused provoked the difficulty under such circumstances as would excite certain and probably desperate resistance,[15] that deceased or assaulted person was following a customary course at the time of the difficulty;[16] that deceased had a lawful purpose in going to the place of the difficulty,[17] and in his conduct at the time of the difficulty,[18] and had a right to be there,[19] evidence of an attempt to fabricate the defense,[20] and evidence of a friendly feeling on the part of deceased toward accused,[21] or that deceased and accused were close friends[22] The prosecution may introduce evidence of the surrounding circumstances,[23] including the killing of another person by accused at the same time he killed the person for whose murder he is on trial,[24] or an assault committed by him immediately thereafter,[25] and may inquire as to accused's feelings when deceased addressed an opprobrious epithet to him[26] On the other hand, a question to a witness for the state on cross-examination as to the direction in which accused was retreating when he was walking back from deceased, and as to whether he was walking in the direction of his home, is properly excluded[27] Where deceased had made several threats to kill accused, and accused claimed that the killing was in self-defense, it was error to compel him to answer on cross-examination whether he had filed any complaint to place deceased under a peace bond after he heard of the threats, as his applying for a peace bond could not enlarge or restrict his right of self-defense, and under the evidence the jury might have considered his failure to apply for a bond as limiting or restricting his right[28] Where the undisputed evidence shows that deceased was the aggressor, evidence of illicit relations between accused and deceased's wife is inadmissible to show who was the aggressor[29] Evidence that accused's wife, believing her husband intoxicated, had, just prior to the fatal encounter, requested a third person to look after him is inadmissible[30] It has been held that evidence is admissible which tends to show that accused had the means to have avoided the combat but made no effort to do so,[31] but where the law does not place on a citizen the duty or burden to retreat in order to avoid the necessity of killing his assailant, the state is not authorized to prove that accused failed to retreat[32] The prosecution may rebut accused's evidence of improper relations between his daughter and deceased by showing that no improper relationship existed[33]

§ 282. Defense of Another

Evidence which would be competent to establish justification in the case of a person killing another in self-defense is competent to establish it in the case where the killing was done in defense of another, but such evidence is subject to being rebutted

Every fact which would be competent to establish justification in the case of a person killing another in self-defense is competent to establish it in the case where the killing was done in defense of another[34] Thus accused may show that deceased was assaulting or attacking the person defended,[35] that deceased entertained hostile feelings toward,[36] and had made threats against,[37] and assaults on, the person defended,[38] and the basis for such threats,[39] that deceased was larger and stronger than the person defended,[40] that accused believed the person defended was in danger of death or great bodily injury,[41] or that deceased was a fierce, violent, and dangerous man[42] It has been held that uncommunicated threats of deceased against a codefendant not on trial are inadmissible,[43] but there is also authority holding that uncommunicated threats against a person defended are admissible as bearing on the probability of who was the aggressor.[44] Evidence of threats of deceased against accused himself is inadmissible[45] Evidence tending to show who provoked the difficulty between deceased and the person defended is admissible,[46] although accused was absent at the time[47] Evidence of insanity of the person defended, prompting accused to act more quickly than he would otherwise have done, is admissible[48] The relationship existing between the slayer and the person defended may be considered, in connection with all the circumstances, in determining whether the homicide stands on a like footing of reason and justice with that of self-defense[49] Evidence to sustain the right of defense of another is admissible only where it would be admissible to sustain the right of self-defense[50] Accused may not introduce evidence as to what eyewitnesses of the homicide thought respecting the danger to the person accused claims to have been protecting[51] Evidence of the mistreatment of the person defended which was unknown to accused at the time of the shooting is ordinarily inadmissible,[52] but, where accused claims that the sole cause of the killing was insulting conduct of deceased toward accused's wife at the time of the homicide, which conduct was denied by the prosecution, proof of previous conduct of a similar nature is admissible to corroborate accused's testimony, even though accused did not know of such prior conduct at the time of the killing[53] Evidence that deceased had theretofore raped or attempted to seduce and rape women, offered as a justification for accused's belief that deceased would thereafter so treat the person in whose defense the homicide is alleged to have been committed is incompetent[54] Evidence of the good character of the person defended is admissible[55]

In rebuttal the prosecution may show that accused's plea is a fabrication,[56] that the person defended was the aggressor,[57] even though accused did not know that such person was at fault,[58] or that the purposes of deceased were not felonious[59] Facts explanatory of threats by deceased against the person defended are admissible[60] Where it is claimed that accused's act was for the purpose of protecting the virtue of a female relative against deceased, evidence of the bad character of the female is admissible,[61] but particular acts on her part, not known to accused, cannot be shown,[62] and, where a father kills to prevent the rape of his daughter, the bad reputation of the daughter for morality cannot be shown[63] Evidence of acts and declarations of the person defended, before the arrival of accused, which are not shown to have been known to accused at the time of the killing, is inadmissible to show that the person defended was the aggressor[64] It has been held that evidence of motives of decedent not disclosed to accused is not admissible against the latter,[65] but, where accused's wife testified that deceased attacked her on entering accused's place of business, and accused claimed that the killing was in defense of his wife, evidence that deceased had said he was going there to collect some money, although this was said out of accused's hearing, has been held admissible[66] Testimony of the wounding and death of the person whom accused claimed to have been defending is relevant[67]

§ 283. Defense against Third Person

Evidence that the killing occurred accidentally while accused was justifiably defending himself against the attack of a third person is admissible, but may be rebutted

Evidence that the wound causing death was inflicted accidentally on deceased by accused in justifiable self-defense against the attack of a third person is admissible,[68] subject to such limitations as would be imposed if the third person had been killed.[69] Such evidence may be rebutted by the prosecution.[70]

§ 284. Defense of Habitation

Evidence which tends to sustain or disprove the defense that the killing was in defense of accused's habitation is admissible

Where there is evidence to show that accused's act was in defense of his habitation, evidence of the general reputation of deceased as a quarrelsome and dangerous man is admissible.[71] Where deceased sought to gain admittance into a house of ill fame by violence, and against the will of the keeper thereof, who attacked the aggressor, from which death ensued, it was held that testimony that threats had been made a week previous to the assault by persons who had broken into the house that they would return some other night and break in again might be received and submitted to the jury under the instructions of the court,[72] but, where the acts of officers of the law who were attempting to break into accused's house to arrest him were such as conferred on him the undoubted right of self-defense if he was mistaken as to their character or object, and the question was as to whether or not accused was ignorant of their official character, evidence that the night before a part of the crowd who were with the officers at the time of the homicide had stoned accused's house was immaterial.[73] Where deceased, who was an officer, was shot while ejecting accused from her home under a writ of possession, and he had previously ejected accused, but she had returned to the premises, evidence as to the advice of counsel given accused concerning her rights was inadmissible.[74] Evidence may be admitted on behalf of the prosecution to prove that accused's act was not in defense of his habitation.[75] An affidavit and search warrant are inadmissible where the officer who had them in his possession did not attempt to use them or make search thereunder,[76] and a search warrant under which deceased or the injured party had no authority to act as he did is not admissible to show that he was not a trespasser.[77]

§ 285. Defense of Property

Evidence is admissible to prove or disprove that the killing or assault was a justifiable act in defense of property, but evidence having no tendency to prove or disprove that fact is inadmissible on the issue

Where accused claims that the killing was done in defense of his property, evidence of accused's title or claim to the property may be admissible,[78] but such evidence is not admissible where the violence used was unjustifiable,[79] and, where only the possession of the land in dispute at the time of the homicide is involved, evidence as to the title is not admissible.[80] Evidence of the reputation of deceased for being a violent and dangerous person is admissible,[81] but not evidence of his general reputation as to character[82] or specific acts of bad conduct on his part.[83] Where deceased was shot while entering on accused's land, testimony as to what he said to a witness with reference to his intention to go on the land at all hazards was proper, accused having had notice of the conversation,[84] but, on a trial for assault with intent to kill one of a party coming on accused's mining claim, evidence that another of the party went to accused's claim, intending to cross it against the will of accused, was inadmissible, as it did not show that the person

assaulted so intended [85] Where an officer had dispossessed deceased and placed accused in possession of premises on which the homicide occurred, evidence of the instructions given accused by the officer at the time of placing him in possession was admissible [86] Evidence of former trespasses committed by deceased on the same land is inadmissible in the absence of any evidence tending to establish an alleged conspiracy to drive defendant off his land [87] Evidence that deceased did not try to rebuild his broken down fence is inadmissible unless it is shown that his purpose was to permit trespass on accused's property [88] Where it was undisputed that deceased had forfeited the property which accused subsequently acquired and that accused was entitled to possession, admission of evidence as to payments made on the property by deceased prior to the forfeiture is prejudicial error [89] Where a killing arose out of a claim for certain hogs which were alleged to be wild, evidence as to efforts of deceased and his brother to take up hogs belonging to other persons is not material on the issue of defense of property [90] Under a statute authorizing a person to defend his legal possession of property, although the right of property is not in him, evidence that accused, although legally, was not rightfully in possession is inadmissible [91] As bearing on the defense that the killing occurred while deceased and an associate were attempting to rob accused in his store, the state may introduce evidence of all actions of deceased and his companions while in the store.[92] Where it appears that deceased had attempted to burglarize accused's store, evidence of the dangerous and lawless reputation of the vicinity of the locus in quo, of previous burglaries and attempted burglaries of the store, and of the communication to accused of threats to burglarize the store is admissible [93] Where the defense was that the killing occurred in an attempt to prevent a burglary of a house owned by accused's wife but occupied by deceased, it was not error, however, to exclude evidence that at some indefinite time in the past a burglary had been committed at accused's house [94] So, in a trial for murder by a trap gun set to kill a chicken thief, evidence that other property of accused had been stolen before he set the gun is properly excluded [95] In a prosecution for assault with intent to commit murder defended on the ground that the act committed was in defense of defendants' property, testimony of one of those accused that he had gone into the question fully and knew the property belonged to him and the other defendant is inadmissible,[96] and testimony that defendants had forcibly ejected a witness from the premises by means of weapons is competent to rebut defendants' claim that the assault was committed while in peaceable possession of such property [97]

C DYING DECLARATIONS

§ 286. Definition

Dying declarations are statements of material facts concerning the cause and circumstances of homicide made by the victim under the fixed and solemn belief that his death is inevitable and near at hand

Dying declarations are statements of material facts concerning the cause and circumstances of homicide made by the victim under the fixed and solemn belief that his death is inevitable and near at hand[98] and as such are to be distinguished from other admissible declarations such as declarations which constitute a part of the res gestæ,[99] or declarations made in the presence of accused which, although not admissible as dying declarations, may be admitted to show the conduct of accused when charged with the crime [1]

Different basis

(1) Dying declaration rests on different basis and requires different proof from res gestæ statement in order to make it admissible.—Hale v. State, 16 S.W.2d 1068, 112 Tex.Cr. 422

(2) "Dying declaration" regards declarant as testifying in that sense of impending death takes place of oath, while "res gestæ" means that event itself speaks.—Jones v. State, 11 S.W.2d 798, 111 Tex.Cr. 172

1. Ill.—People v. Borella, 143 N.E. 471, 312 Ill. 34.

A final statement made by a person prior to the time he was executed is not a dying declaration [2]

§ 287. General Rule as to Admissibility

a In general
b Reasons for rule
c Constitutionality of rule

a. In General

While dying declarations are secondary evidence or a species of hearsay evidence, they constitute one of the several exceptions to the rule which excludes hearsay evidence

In prosecutions for homicide, the declarations of deceased, voluntarily made, while in articulo mortis, and under the solemn conviction of approaching dissolution, concerning the facts and circumstances constituting the res gestæ of his destruction, where deceased would be a competent witness if living, discussed in detail infra § 288 et seq, are always admissible in evidence [3] The rule admitting dying declarations is not confined to their introduction by the prosecution, they are also admissible in behalf of the defense [4]

Although dying declarations are secondary[5] or a species of hearsay evidence,[6] they constitute one of the several exceptions to the rule which excludes hearsay evidence [7] However, they should be received with caution[8] and the rule authorizing their admission should not be extended beyond the reasons which justify it,[9] because, while the solemnity of the occasion may supply the place of an oath, nothing can fully supply the absence of a cross-examination,[10] and because such declarations have great and sometimes due weight with juries [11] It has been stated that the rule admitting dying declarations may not be broadened, except by statute [12]

Use of profanity. The fact that decedent used profane language does not render his dying declaration inadmissible [13]

Motive, self-serving purpose. The declaration must not spring from a motive to fabricate or serve himself,[14] and a dying declaration clearly shown to have been actuated by malice, venom, ill will, and desire for revenge should be excluded [15] However, the absence of any self-serving purpose is not an essential element of the circumstantial guaranty of the trustworthiness of dying declarations [16]

Where accused admits homicide The fact that accused admitted killing deceased has been held not to render a dying declaration inadmissible where it tended to negative accused's claim of self-defense [17]

b. Reasons for Rule

One reason for the admission of dying declarations lies in the necessity of the case, and an important reason for excepting them from the rule against hearsay evidence is that the solemnity of the circumstances under which they are made naturally constitutes a guaranty of their truth equal to that which is afforded by the customary oath

An important reason for excepting dying declarations from the rule against hearsay evidence is that the solemnity of the circumstances under which such declarations are made naturally constitutes a guaranty of their truth equal to that which is afforded by the customary oath [18]

In addition to the fact that the solemnity of the circumstances under which a dying declaration is made may operate as a substitute for a positive oath, an additional reason for the admission of dying declarations lies in the necessity of the case[19] and the impossibility of producing better proof of the fact where the victim of the homicide has died, and there is, as often happens, no other witness to the transaction [20] However, the admissibility of dying declarations does not depend on the absence of other evidence of the same facts They are admissible in evidence, although there are eyewitnesses who testify positively to the facts, and it is no objection to their admission that the exigencies of the case do not require it [21]

c. Constitutionality of Rule

It is well settled that the admission in evidence of dying declarations is not an infraction of the constitutional or statutory right of the accused to be confronted by the witnesses against him

It is well settled that the admission in evidence of the dying declarations of the person murdered is not an infraction of the constitutional or statutory right of accused to be confronted by the witnesses against him [22]

In sustaining the constitutionality of this rule, the courts have sometimes taken the position that the declarant is not regarded as the "witness" whom accused is constitutionally entitled to meet "face to face"[23] This reasoning has, however, been criticized as unsatisfactory[24] Further reasons are that the rule admitting dying declarations existed at common law before the adoption of the United States Constitution, although the right to have the witness against him examined in his presence was practically secured to accused by Magna Charta,[25] and that, as the evidence is admissible for accused as well as for the state, accused might be deprived of a very important right if this evidence were excluded[26]

§ 288. Conditions Essential to Admissibility

§ 289. —— Declarant Must Be in Extremis

Unsworn statements can be admitted in evidence as dying declarations only when made in extremis,[27] and after death has ensued[28] However, the admissibility of evidence of this character does not depend on the length of the interval between the declaration and the death,[29] but on the state of de-

clarant's mind and his belief that he is in a dying condition, as discussed infra § 290 The length of time elapsing between the making of the declarations and the declarant's death is, however, one of the elements to be considered in determining whether the declarations were made under a sense of impending death.[30]

Before infliction of injury Declarations made before the infliction of the mortal injury are, of course, inadmissible as dying declarations[31]

§ 290. —— Consciousness of, and Belief in, Impending Death

It is essential that a dying declaration be made when declarant has abandoned all hope of recovery from the injury inflicted by the accused and is under the firm conviction that his death is inevitable and near at hand. It is the condition of mind of the declarant, and not the belief of others, which determines admissibility, and an inadmissible statement may become admissible if approved or repeated after all hope of recovery is abandoned.

It is not enough that the statement be made when declarant is in extremis, it is also essential that it be made when he has abandoned all hope of recovery from the injury inflicted by accused and is under the firm conviction that his death is inevitable and near at hand,[32] and the fact that declarant believes himself in great danger and entertains a fear that he must die is not sufficient [33] It is immaterial how or by what means deceased became conscious that he was dying [34] It is no objection to the admissibility of the declarations that declarant's belief of impending death was induced by the statements of attendants,[35] and, conversely, that no physician or other person had told declarant that there was no hope for him does not render the statement inadmissible [36]

Degree of apprehension No absolute standard of the degree of apprehension or the depth of the solemnity into which declarant has been submerged can be fixed for the introduction of dying declarations [37] While it has sometimes been thought that a declaration should not be excluded simply because the declarant entertained a faint and lingering hope of recovery,[38] according to the clear preponderance of authority if deceased had the slightest hope of recovery when the declarations were made they are inadmissible [39]

There is authority for the view that the person making the declaration must entertain a settled and hopeless expectation of immediate or, in other words, of impending death,[40] and that a mere belief of declarant that he will not recover from his injuries, but that he will ultimately die from them, is not sufficient to admit his declarations in evidence[41] However, it has also been held that it is not necessary to show that deceased was apprehensive of immediate dissolution, it being sufficient to show that he had abandoned all hope and regarded his death as impending and certain as a result of the injury inflicted by accused,[42] or, as it is otherwise stated, that it is not necessary that the declaration should have been made in articulo mortis[43]

Condition of mind, belief of others It is the condition of mind of declarant which determines the admissibility of this class of proof,[44] and the fact that others believe declarant would not recover would not render the statement admissible where declarant showed no realization of impending death[45] Conversely, the belief of others that he would recover does not render the evidence inadmissible,[46] although death may not have followed for some time[47] If declarant believes himself beyond hope, the declaration is admissible, although the attending physician or surgeon may believe him to be progressing favorably,[48] even when such belief is expressed to declarant,[49] and hence, of course, when it is not expressed,[50] or is expressed after the declarations are made[51]

Reiteration A statement made under circumstances which would not render it admissible as a dying declaration becomes admissible as such, it is held, if approved or repeated by the declarant after he had abandoned all hope of recovery,[52] but, on the other hand, it has been said that a declaration prepared by a person in full possession of his mental faculties, and in confident hope of recovery, to be signed in the possible event of a subsequent conviction of a fatal termination, is too much tainted to be admissible in evidence[53] The reiteration of the alleged facts cannot, of course, be admitted if made when hope has been regained[54]

§ 291. —— Other Conditions

Dying declarations must be voluntary A declaration which is competent when made will not be rendered incompetent by the fact that the declarant, either before or afterward, entertained some hope of recovery

tue of statutory provisions, that it be made voluntarily,[55] it is not necessary that deceased have expressed a wish to make a dying declaration[56] Also it is not necessary that the declaration have been made immediately after the injury[57]

A declaration which is competent evidence when made will not be rendered incompetent by a subsequent temporary revival of the dying person,[58] or by the fact that before or afterward he entertained some hope of recovery.[59] The subsequent expression of hope may, however, have a tendency to show that the same hope existed while the previous declarations were being made[60] Where the declarations were made under a sense of impending death, the fact that deceased did not seek spiritual comfort does not destroy their effect[61]

§ 292. Form of Declaration and Manner of Communication

a. In general

b Written declarations

a. In General

A dying declaration may be partly oral and partly written, and the fact that it was made in response to questions does not necessarily deprive it of its voluntary character. Where the victim is unable to speak audibly a dying declaration, communicated by signs, may be received in evidence.

It is immaterial in what form a dying declaration is made,[62] and it matters not to whom it was made[63] It need not be in writing,[64] and it may be partly oral and partly written[65]

Interruptions and successive statements. The declaration need not all be made at one time without interruption or turning aside to other matters[66] Where several dying declarations are made at different times, all are admissible,[67] even though contradictory,[68] and the fact that a dying declaration has been reduced to writing will not preclude evidence of unwritten declarations made on other occasions[69]

was made in response to questions does not necessarily deprive it of its voluntary character or render it inadmissible [71] While it has been held that dying declarations may be elicited by means of leading questions,[72] and that declarant may even be urged to answer, as this affects only the value of the evidence and not its admissibility,[73] it has also been held, sometimes by virtue of statutory provisions, that it is essential to the admissibility of dying declarations that they were not made in answer to leading interrogatories[74] which were calculated to lead declarant to make any particular statement,[75] and this requirement applies also to the statements of the wounded person in regard to his hope of recovery [76] The interrogation of decedent as to the sense of impending death by reference to printed questions is not necessarily objectionable, provided the questions are put, not in a perfunctory manner, but in such a way as to impress the injured person with their true character and meaning [77]

Communication by signs Unless the response is one prohibited as an answer to a leading question,[78] where the victim was unable to speak audibly, a dying declaration communicated by signs may be received in evidence,[79] although deceased previously and subsequently made verbal communications [80] Where the declaration is communicated by signs, it must appear that declarant understood the language employed in the statement, or was able to detect any erroneous inference as to his real meaning [81]

Presence of, and notice to, accused It is not necessary that accused should be present[82] or be represented by counsel,[83] or that he should even have notice of the taking of the ante-mortem statement of his victim [84]

b. Written Declarations

A dying declaration which is read by or to declarant, or signed by him, is ordinarily admissible, notwithstanding it is not in his exact language The fact that it is made under oath does not render it inadmissible.

A written declaration may be received in evidence where it was approved by declarant after reading it or hearing it read by another, and where it is shown by a competent witness who was present at the time to be the identical statement so made and approved,[85] although it is not signed by declarant,[86] or it may have been signed without hav-

In Kentucky
(1) It has been held that a written declaration was inadmissible where neither signed read over, nor in any way recognized by declarant after it was written.—Winstead v Commonwealth 243 S W 40, 195 Ky 484—30 C J p 259 note 78

(2) However, in a late case a written declaration was held inadmissible where not signed by declarant, although approved by him.—Huff v Commonwealth, 108 S.W 2d 1044, 270 Ky 36.

ing been read[87] So a declaration is admissible where it is taken down in writing by a person present, after which it is read to deceased,[88] or read by him,[89] and he assents to it and signs it[90]

However, a written declaration which was neither read by declarant nor read to him by another, or signed, or assented to, or in any way recognized by him after it was written cannot be received in evidence[91]

Form and contents According to the more generally accepted rule, dying declarations written down by a third person and assented to by declarant need not be in his exact language,[92] nor is it material that the questions are omitted and the answers only given when they are reduced to writing and are read and approved by declarant,[93] but a statement amounting substantially to the conclusion of the person writing it as to what declarant meant is inadmissible[94] The fact that a witness was unable to detail all that was said by deceased at the time does not affect the admissibility as a dying declaration of a written statement read to, and signed by, deceased[95]

It has been held not necessary that a written declaration be dated[96]

Dying declarations may be admissible, although they are given in a foreign language through an interpreter to the person writing them down,[97] and for that reason do not contain all of decedent's testimony[98]

Oath or attestation The fact that a dying declaration is made under the sanction of an oath does not render it inadmissible,[99] and the fact that the declaration is subscribed and sworn to does not entitle it to any additional force where the oath is not authorized by law[1]

A written declaration is not required to be attested,[2] and the fact that persons signing a written declaration as witnesses were not witnesses of the facts stated therein does not affect the admissibility of the writing[3]

On reaffirmance of a previous declaration after declarant became conscious of approaching death and was without hope of recovery, the statements need not be again shown to or read over to him[4]

§ 293 In What Cases Admissible

As a general rule, dying declarations are admissible only in cases of homicide, where the death of the declarant is the subject of the charge

Prior statement as corroborative circumstance

Where deceased signed a declaration without reading it or having it read to him, on being informed that it was the same as a prior written declaration the prior declaration was held admissible as a corroborative circumstance of the fact that both declarations were the same.—Court v. Presumption of knowledge

Where oral statement of deceased was taken down in writing and signed by deceased, but it was not shown that statement was ever read to or approved by deceased, the presumption would be that it had been read to him or that he knew its contents.—Edmonds v. Commonwealth, 264 S.W. 1100, 204 Ky. 495.

4. Tex.—Snell v. State, 15 S.W. 722, 29 Tex.App. 236, 25 Am.S.R. 723.

Subject to statutory provisions, it is the general rule that dying declarations are admissible only in cases of homicide,[5] where the death of declarant is the subject of the charge.[6] According to the weight of authority this rule is adhered to where accused has killed two or more persons by the same felonious act and is on trial for the murder of one of them,[7] but there are cases holding that on the trial of accused for the murder of one of his victims the dying declarations of another are admissible, inasmuch as he might have been charged in one indictment for the murder of all of them when such evidence would have been clearly admissible.[8]

Where there is evidence of a conspiracy connecting accused with the person who killed declarant, dying declarations as to who killed declarant are held admissible against accused.[9]

The admissibility of dying declarations in civil actions is discussed in Death § 83, and in Evidence § 238, and in criminal prosecutions generally, in Criminal Law § 741.

Abortion. On an indictment for feloniously producing an abortion, the death of the woman is not an essential ingredient of the crime and her dying declarations are not admissible in evidence, unless they are made so by statute, as shown in Abortion § 25, but, where the death of a woman results from an unlawful attempt to produce an abortion, the perpetrator of the offense may be prosecuted for felonious homicide and then her dying declarations are admissible in evidence.[10]

§ 294. Mode of Proof and Use in Evidence

§ 295. —— Foundation or Predicate

a In general
b Sense of impending death
c Presence or absence of jury
d Questions for court and jury

a. In General

A proper foundation must be laid for the admission of an alleged dying declaration and general rules apply with respect to the admissibility and sufficiency of the evidence thereof

While proof of a predicate is premature until it has been made to appear that a dying statement had been made,[11] a proper foundation must be laid for the admission of an alleged dying declaration,[12] and, a fortiori, the production of evidence which would serve as a foundation for receiving dying declarations is proper.[13]

A predicate for a dying declaration reduced to writing can be made by parol proof as well as where the dying declaration is not reduced to

Witnesses and examination thereof The preliminary evidence as to admissibility may be shown by the testimony of any competent witness having knowledge of the fact,[14] and it need not be given by the same witnesses who testify as to the declarations themselves.[15] The examination of witnesses may be conducted either by the court[16] or by counsel in its presence.[17] Where a witness is being examined concerning dying declarations in the absence of the jury for the purpose of testing the legality of his testimony, and the prosecuting attorney refuses to question the witness for the information of the court, counsel for accused should be permitted so to do.[18] Ordinarily, the court should permit both the state's attorney and the accused's attorney to examine the witness in determining whether dying declarations are admissible,[19] and it is within the discretion of the court to determine how far the preliminary examination to determine the admissibility of dying declarations of deceased shall extend.[20] However, counsel for accused may not question the witness as to irrelevant matters.[21] Evidence of the circumstances under which a declaration is taken is admissible in addition to the statement itself,[22] but where testimony is admitted as a predicate for the introduction of a dying declaration, it should be limited to that purpose.[23]

The judge cannot require the testimony introduced to lay the foundation for offering dying declarations to be reduced to writing, in the absence of disagreement between him and accused's counsel, as to what that testimony is.[24]

Contradictory evidence While it has been held that the court may determine the admissibility of dying declarations reduced to writing on the evidence produced by the state, without hearing any evidence from the other side,[25] the view is also taken that the party opposing the admission of the declaration has the right to introduce countervailing testimony on the issue of declarant's sense of impending death.[26] However, evidence which at best is but a mere speculation was held properly excluded.[27] Although it has been held that evidence that deceased did not have a sense of his impending death, to be admissible, must relate to the time of the declaration,[28] it has also been held that subsequent expressions of hope are admissible and may be considered in determining the weight to be given the declaration,[29] and that accused may be permitted after an alleged dying declaration has been introduced to introduce evidence as to the condition and state of mind of deceased[30] Accused is entitled to submit to the jury a paper bearing deceased's signature where such paper is separate from the dying declaration, and this is not a violation of the rule that a written dying declaration cannot go to the jury room for investigation[31]

Order of proof The admission in evidence of a dying declaration before proof of the facts rendering it admissible has been held not to be harmful error, where the facts are subsequently established,[32] but, although there is authority to the contrary,[33] it has been held error to compel accused to proceed, pending a decision as to the admissibility of such a declaration, where it is subsequently held inadmissible in part and accused is convicted[34] The admission of evidence prejudicial to accused after a dying declaration has been received on proper foundation previously laid cannot be justified on the ground that it is evidence of decedent's sense of impending death[35]

Notice to accused The prosecution is not required to give notice to accused that it had the dying declaration as a condition precedent to the admission of such declaration[36]

Sufficiency of predicate Because of their inherent infirmities as evidence, it has been held that dying declarations should not be admitted or considered by the jury unless the prerequisites which are essential to their admissibility are clearly established,[37] or, as the rule is otherwise stated, beyond a reasonable doubt,[38] or to the satisfaction of the court,[39] and declarant's hopeless state of mind must not be left to conjecture[40] It has been held that the fact that dying declarations are taken under suspicious circumstances or drawn out by doubtful means is not ground for their exclusion, but they may be permitted to go to the jury for what they are worth[41] In the notes will be found cases in which the sufficiency of the evidence to permit the admission of dying declarations was considered[42]

Successive or interrupted declarations. A predicate laid for the introduction of evidence of a dying declaration at one time cannot be used as a basis for the admission of evidence of another dying declaration made at another time,[43] but the fact that an interruption took place does not affect the admissibility of the statement where it was not shown that either declarant's bodily condition or mental apprehension thereof had changed for the better[44]

Declarations offered by accused It is held that the requirements as to preliminary proof apply as well when the offer is made by accused as when by the prosecution,[45] but in some jurisdictions it is held that the same strictness will not be required when the declaration is offered in favor of accused as when it is made against him[46] Accused cannot complain of the exclusion of evidence offered to lay a foundation for the introduction of a dying declaration when such purpose is not shown at the time of the offer[47]

b. Sense of Impending Death

(1) In general

(2) Particular evidentiary circumstances

(1) In General

As a foundation for the admission of a dying declaration, it must be shown that it was made by the declarant under a sense of impending death and without hope of recovery

As a foundation for the admission of a statement as a dying declaration, it must be shown that it was made by decedent under a sense of impending death and without hope of recovery[48] For this purpose

Manner of expression immaterial

How deceased expressed his understanding that he was about to die has been held immaterial—Davis v People, 238 P 25, 77 Colo 516

Time

(1) Dying declaration, to be admissible, requires only proof that deceased knew that he was about to die when he made the declaration, and such proof may be furnished by what was said immediately after as well as by what was said immediately before so-called dying declaration—State, v Clifton, 174 So 109, 187 La 62—State v Willis, 158 So 826, 181 La 154—30 C J p 263 note 37 [a] (1)

(2) A statement as to impending dissolution made immediately after being shot has been held not a sufficient predicate for a declaration made the following day, without any showing that declarant was then under the belief of impending dissolution—Lakey v State, 93 So 51, 18 Ala App 442

(3) A declaration made at night was held inadmissible where deceased has said nothing concerning his belief of impending death since early that morning - Bailey v Commonwealth 157 S W 2d 100, 288 Ky 613

(4) Other statements and illustrations see 30 C J p 263 note 37 [a]

Strict proof not required

Statements of deceased that "they got him this time" and that "he was going to die" from his wounds without charging accused with stabbing him or relating details of affray in which deceased was stabbed, were mere declarations of facts which did not require strict proof of realization of impending death to be admissible—People v Pollock, 89 P 2d 128, 31 Cal App 2d 747

clarant said that he would die does not necessarily show that he was without hope and expected a speedy dissolution; his statements in this regard may be overcome by the surrounding circumstances,[56] and it is possible that, even where declarant expressed an opinion that he would recover, the circumstances may distinctly show that such was not his real belief.[57]

Opinions and conclusions Testimony that deceased realized he was mortally wounded,[58] or that deceased knew he was going to die, the witness not being cross-examined as to the basis for this statement,[59] or the opinion of a witness who has had full opportunity for reaching a correct conclusion that deceased was aware of impending dissolution,[60] has been held sufficient. However, it has been held, on the other hand, that declarant's belief that death was impending could not be shown by the bare conclusion of the witness that declarant knew he was going to die in a short time,[61] and that the opinion of the witness that deceased was under a religious sense of responsibility to his Maker is inadmissible.[62]

Contradictory statements of deceased as to expectation of impending death may prevent the admission of a statement as a dying declaration.[63]

(2) Particular Evidentiary Circumstances

Various particular circumstances have been considered in determining whether the declarant was under a sense of impending death at the time he made a statement

Among the specific circumstances that are often referred to as tending to show declarant's sense of impending dissolution are the fact that a priest had been summoned who, before the making of the statement, had administered to declarant the last rites of the church,[64] or that declarant had sought the consolation of religion in the belief that his end was near.[65] However, declarant's failure to call a minister raises no inference against the declaration when there was none of declarant's faith in the vicinity.[66]

That declarant was under a sense of impending dissolution may be inferred from his apparent condition,[67] such as the nature of his injuries, or state of his illness,[68] and may be inferred from his evident danger or peril.[69] So also the court may consider whether the conduct of deceased was that of a person conscious of impending death, as whether he gave directions respecting his funeral, his will, the care and custody of his children, or took leave of his relatives and friends, and the like.[70]

Opinion of physician or attendant The previously disclosed opinion of declarant's physician or other attendants that his injuries were mortal and must speedily prove fatal is often considered as a circumstance tending to show decedent's consciousness of impending death,[71] but such an opinion by itself is not always sufficient.[72] If declarant believes himself beyond hope, the belief of the attending physician or surgeon is immaterial, as shown supra § 290

Request for, or consent to, medical assistance The bare circumstance that declarant consents to an operation[73] or to removal to a sanitarium or hospital for the satisfaction of his family[74] does not necessarily indicate hope of recovery. Requests made by deceased for a physician's aid may, in connection with his other expressions and the circumstances, be regarded as indicating a hope of cure,[75] but not necessarily so,[76] and the expression of a desire to see another physician does not show that declarant did not appreciate his condition.[77]

c. Presence or Absence of Jury

The safer and better practice is to retire the jury during the preliminary investigation into the admissibility of dying declarations

More consistent with hope than despair

As regards issue whether declaration of deceased was admissible as dying declaration fact that deceased asked for a physician to be sent for did not of itself prove that she had hope of recovery, but it was more consistent with hope than despair—State v Sanford, 97 P 2d 915, 44 N M 66

77. Pa—Commonwealth v. Barille, 113 A 663, 270 Pa 388

sion d of this section, the preliminary proof touching the question of admissibility is in the first instance very properly made to the court in the absence of the jury,[78] but as to whether such preliminary evidence should or should not be given in the presence of the jury the authorities are not agreed.[79] While it has been held that the preliminary examination may, in the discretion of the court, be conducted in the presence of the jury,[80] it has also been held that the jury should be withdrawn before the preliminary proof is given,[81] and a failure to do so constitutes error provided objection is made to the preliminary proof's being made in the presence of the jury,[82] and provided, of course, the declaration is not properly admissible.[83] It has been said that the safer and better practice is to retire the jury during the preliminary investigation.[84] An accused is not injured by the refusal to admit such evidence in the presence of the jury where he fails thereafter to take advantage of an opportunity to introduce it in the absence of the jury.[85]

The same facts which were considered by the court in passing on the admissibility of the declarations must of necessity be considered by the jury in deciding on their credibility,[86] hence, when the court, having examined the question in the absence of the jury, decides in favor of the admissibility of the declarations, the preliminary proof should then be submitted to the jury to enable them to determine the credibility of the evidence,[87] and, even though evidence to disprove the admissibility of a dying declaration preliminary to its presentation to the jury is properly excluded, it may subsequently be introduced as bearing on the weight to be given thereto.[88]

d. Questions for Court and Jury

While it has been held that it is for the court to determine the admissibility of dying declarations and that it is error to submit such question to the jury, it has also been held that it is for the jury, under proper instructions from the court, to determine ultimately whether declarant was in articulo mortis and conscious of his dying condition

In limine the question whether alleged dying declarations were made under such circumstances as to render them admissible in evidence is to be determined by the court on the preliminary proof or predicate for their introduction,[89] and there is au-

Matters considered

(1) In determining whether declarations were made under a sense of impending death so as to render them admissible as dying declarations, trial court should consider all circumstances surrounding declarant at the time the declarations were made, such as the character of the wound, the declaration of deceased himself that he could not live and the fact that he died shortly afterward —Cross v State, 143 S W 2d 530, 200 Ark 1165—Clements v State, 133 S W 2d 844, 199 Ark 69

(2) In determining frame of mind of declarant regarding his belief with respect to impending death as respects admissibility of dying statements, the court may consider his physical condition, the nature and seriousness of his wounds, his knowledge of his grave condition, and his conduct, language, and statements —People v Wilson, 129 P 2d 149, 54 Cal App 2d 434

Nature of each case

Whether deceased was sane when purported dying declaration was made is properly submitted to jury —Perez v State, 119 S W 2d 1044, 135 Tex Cr 311—Stroud v State, 46 S W 2d 689, 120 Tex Cr 466

Manner in which issue raised

It is immaterial whether issue as to sufficiency of predicate for dying declaration be raised by direct proof offered by the defense, or be developed from the state's evidence alone, and it may arise from surrounding facts or from nature of the declaration itself —Yarbrough v State, 252 S W 1069, 95 Tex Cr 36

"If I die"

Whether use of words "if I die" by declarant in dying declaration manifested doubt or uncertainty as to declarant's impending death held for jury —Freihage v U S, C C A Alaska, 56 F 2d 127

ment was made under a sense of impending death, it should be submitted to the jury with an instruction that they must disregard it,[92] or that they cannot consider it,[93] or, as it is sometimes stated by the court, that they should disregard it,[94] if on all the evidence they believe that such statement was not made in articulo mortis and under a sense of impending death

It is the province of the jury to determine whether the declaration was in fact made,[95] and whether the witnesses testifying thereto speak the truth,[96] especially where apparent discrepancies may have resulted from difference of recollection of the persons who heard them[97] When the preliminary question of admissibility has been determined by the court and dying declarations have been admitted in evidence, their credibility is exclusively for the jury, whose province it is to weigh them and the circumstances under which they were made, and give to them only such credit as they may think they deserve, on the whole evidence in the case,[98] including those circumstances which were proved to the court in laying the foundation for their admission[99] The jury may even pass on the credibility of declarations which are incompetent as evidence when no motion to strike out or request to instruct with reference thereto has been made[1]

The court may instruct the jury as to the proper rule for determining the weight to be given such declarations,[2] but should be particular not to invade the province of the jury[3] Where it is held that declarations should not go to the jury unless the court is satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that they were made under a sense of impending death, the court is not bound to instruct that it entertains no opinion whether the declaration submitted is the dying declaration of decedent[4]

§ 296. —— Proof of Oral Declaration; Secondary Evidence of Written Declarations

Ordinarily, where a dying declaration is not reduced to writing, it may be proved by witnesses who heard it, but where there is a competent written declaration it must first be introduced or its nonproduction accounted for

Where it does not appear that the declarations of deceased were reduced to writing, they may be proved by witnesses who heard them[5] When the declaration is made by question and answer, the entire conversation, question and answer, should be given as far as possible,[6] although it has been held not error to permit the reading of questions and answers without following the order in which they were asked, and omitting some questions and answers[7] However, if the witness cannot state the exact language of declarant he may state the substance of the declaration,[8] although he is subject to criticism as to its accuracy[9] Mere expressions of opinion by the witness in the course of questioning declarant should not be admitted[10]

Number and competency of witnesses Analogously to the general rule that it is not necessary for the prosecution to produce all the witnesses to a homicide as shown in Criminal Law § 1019, it is not necessary in proving a dying declaration to call all the witnesses who were present when it was made,[11] and the court may, in proper cases, place a reasonable limit on the number of witnesses who may be called to prove a dying declaration.[12] However, it has been held the proper practice to place on the stand all present when the declaration was made[13]

The evidence as to the declaration need not be given by the witnesses who testify as to the foundation or predicate for the admission of the dying declaration,[14] and an eyewitness to a homicide may properly testify to deceased's dying declaration[15] Dying declarations may be proved by declarant's wife,[16] but the competency of accused's wife to prove the dying declarations of deceased is dependent on her competency as a witness against her husband[17] That a witness may have made a statement as to alleged dying declarations, on the examination by the court into their admissibility, different from that thereafter made by him in the hearing of the jury is not ground for excluding his evidence[18]

Declarations delivered in a foreign language may be testified to in that language and translated into English by a sworn interpreter[19]

Effect of written declarations Where there is a complete written declaration properly authenticated, it must first be introduced, if accessible,[20] and unless its nonproduction is satisfactorily explained it cannot be proved by parol evidence[21] or by a copy of the original declaration[22] Also oral testimony

(4) However it has also been held that, where a dying declaration was reduced to writing and signed by deceased, parol evidence of its contents is inadmissible, in the absence of proof of the loss of the writing — Saylor v Commonwealth, 30 S W 390, 97 Ky 184

to vary a written declaration is incompetent.[23] However, where the absence of the original writing has been satisfactorily accounted for, the declarations may be established by secondary evidence.[24] The declaration in such circumstances may be proved by parol, although there may be a copy in existence.[25]

An unsigned written declaration will not preclude the introduction of parol evidence of such declaration on the ground that the writing is the best evidence,[26] although read to declarant and approved by him.[27] A fortiori, where a dying declaration is not wholly reduced to writing, and the writing is not signed by declarant, parol evidence is admissible to prove the declaration.[28] Where a written statement is sworn to as correct as far as it goes, although not complete and not signed by declarant, it is proper to read such statement to the jury,[29] and for the witness to supply from his recollection the remainder of the statement.[30]

Where a written declaration has been rejected at the instance of accused, he cannot object to the admission of parol evidence as to what deceased said.[31] Testimony that deceased said that the statement read over to him was correct is admissible.[32] Where, after a written declaration is signed by decedent, a statement relating to the res gestæ is added, it should not be admitted as a part of the written declaration, but should be proved in the same manner and under the same conditions as an oral declaration.[33]

Refreshing recollection Where the declarations of deceased have been reduced to writing and signed by declarant, use of the writing to establish the terms of the declaration is not limited to refreshing the memory of the witness; the writing is proper evidence to establish the terms of the declaration.[34] Even where a written memorandum of a dying declaration is not regarded as primary evidence, the witness who made it may use it to refresh his memory,[35] although it is not necessary to do so.[36]

§ 297. —— Compelling Introduction

Where part of a written dying declaration has been introduced by the state, the accused has been held entitled to have the whole declaration introduced in evidence

Whether the prosecution shall, at the instance of accused, be required to introduce the dying statement of deceased rests in the sound discretion of the court.[37] Where part of a written dying declaration has been introduced by the state, accused is entitled to have the whole declaration introduced in evidence in order that the jury may pass on the weight and credibility.[38]

§ 298. Competency of Declarations as Evidence

Dying declarations generally are admissible only as to those facts and circumstances which constitute the res gestæ of the homicide, the fact and cause of the killing, and the identity of the parties, they are usually incompetent if only narrative of matters happening before or after the killing and not directly connected with it

Although dying declarations are substitutes for sworn testimony and must yield to the general rules governing the admissibility of evidence,[39] it has been stated that the strict rules which ordinarily are applicable to the admission in evidence of the spoken word do not always apply with the same strictness to dying declarations[40] Dying declarations are admissible as to those facts and circumstances constituting the res gestæ of the homicide,[41] the res gestæ embracing not only the actual facts of the assault and the circumstances surrounding it, but the matters immediately antecedent to, and having a direct causal connection with, the assault, as well as acts immediately following the assault and so closely connected with it as to form a part of the occurrence[42] Thus they are admissible to prove the fact of the killing,[43] the name of the victim,[44] the cause of the killing,[45] the identity of the murder-

Although it has been stated that if dying declarations relate to facts to which declarant could have testified they are admissible,[48] such a statement has been criticized as too broad and sweeping,[49] and the rule is frequently laid down, sometimes by virtue of statutory provisions which are merely declaratory of the common law, that such declarations are restricted to the act of killing and the circumstances immediately attending it and forming part of the res gestæ,[50] and, likewise, such declarations are

"This statement would imply that declarant becomes a general witness, and that anything he might say in a dying declaration, if he could give it in evidence were he alive, would be competent evidence upon a trial of the accused for his homicide. This is not the law and never has been in this state. The declarant does not become a general witness, but his dying declarations are confined to such facts and circumstances as immediately attend the homicide and form a part of the res gestæ. A declaration as to a previous transaction separate and distinct from the homicide, is not admissible even though it be a threat made by the defendant against the declarant"—State v Graham, supra

Portions of declaration ordinarily admissible

Ordinarily the admissible portions of a dying declaration, other than that portion which would show that declarant had abandoned all hope of recovery, must be confined to those particulars of fact as to the identity of the criminal agent, the facts of the delivery of the fatal wound or the giving of the poison, and to such further statements as belong to the cause and circumstances of the act—Dean v State, 160 So 581, 173 Miss 254, suggestion of error overruled 162 So 155, 173 Miss 254

Manner and circumstances of injuries

The statements of a dying person can be admitted as his dying declaration only when the statements relate to the manner and circumstances of the infliction on him by another of injuries resulting in his death—Stevens v Commonwealth, 298 S W 678, 221 Ky 222

It was held proper to confine the statements to the act of killing, position of persons, what was said by the persons involved, what instruments were used, and in substance exclude everything except what related to the res gestæ—Morris v State, 130 So 582, 100 Fla 850

they are usually inadmissible to prove what occurred either before the commission of the act which caused declarant's death[55] or after that transaction[56] However, dying declarations have been considered competent although the facts stated were not a part of the res gestæ of the homicide,[57] as where they related to declarant's state of extremis and his consciousness thereof,[58] or tended to establish declarant's mental competency when that was in issue,[59] and it has been said that since such evidence is already confined to the act of killing and attendant circumstances, the res gestæ, public policy should not be further narrowed by limitations not within its spirit, to the extent that such an important instrument of proof should be impaired or destroyed[60]

While there is authority for the view that dying declarations must go in as a whole, although some of the statements, if standing alone, would be inadmissible,[61] and that irrelevant matter will not exclude the declaration as a whole,[62] as a general rule any part of a dying declaration which is admissible may go to the jury, and the inadmissible part will be excluded,[63] unless the objectionable portion is

As a general rule dying declarations are admitted from the necessity of the case to identify the prisoner and deceased, to establish the circumstances of the res gestæ, and to show the transaction from which death resulted When, however, they relate to former and distinct transactions they do not come within the principle of necessity—Webb v State, 106 S W 2d 683, 133 Tex Cr 32

A mere interruption of a few moments in the conflict between deceased and accused will not exclude deceased's declarations as to the proceedings before the interruption, when it is apparent that the entire occurrence was one conflict—U S v Heath, 20 D C 272

A chronological recital of the events leading up to and including the alleged commission of the crime charged was admissible since the incidents and occurrences set forth were directly connected with the crime—People v Kreutzer, 188 N E 422 354 Ill 430

Admissible if relevant to material issue

A statement offered as a dying declaration, when made under the conditions prescribed by the law, is competent as to any matter material to the issue on trial, even though not admissible as a part of the res gestæ - People v Borella, 143 N E 471 312 Ill 34

so intimately interwoven with the thread of the narrative that it could not be separated without marring or destroying the sense of the statement[64] or the remainder of the declaration is necessary to understand fully declarant's meaning.[65] That the declaration contains matter in rebuttal does not affect its admissibility.[66]

Expressions of forgiveness of accused by deceased are inadmissible.[67]

Corroboration A dying declaration, otherwise incompetent, may not be introduced in evidence for the purpose of corroborating other testimony.[68]

§ 299. —— Conclusions and Opinions

a In general
b Provocation
c. Identity of malefactor

a. In General

Generally, a mere conclusion or expression of opinion or belief by a dying man is not admissible as a dying declaration

Although there is some authority to the effect that the same consideration of necessity which is the foundation of the rule excepting dying declarations from the rule of hearsay evidence, discussed supra § 287, operates in favor of admitting in evidence dying declarations of conclusions of fact as well as in favor of admitting such declarations of specific facts,[69] the rule supported by the great weight of authority is to the effect that a mere conclusion or expression of opinion or belief by a dying man is not admissible as a dying declaration,[70] except, it may be, to impeach other declarations or portions of the declaration of decedent, discussed infra § 305, and, where a dying declaration contains unimportant expressions of opinion, which, taken in connection with the entire declaration are not prejudicial, the entire declaration has been held admissible.[71] A fortiori, a part of a declaration stating a matter of fact, which is separable from the opinions stated, is admissible.[72] However, the rule excluding opinions or conclusions has not always been strictly enforced where the declaration was favorable to accused.[73]

It is immaterial whether the fact that the declaration is a mere opinion appears from the statement itself, or from other undisputed evidence, showing that it was impossible for declarant to

Necessity of rebuttal
In the absence of competent evidence to sustain accused's contention that deceased received the fatal injuries from being struck by a train, deceased's dying declaration to the effect that no train struck him was inadmissible as unrelated to the res gestæ although it was held that, had accused produced competent evidence to establish his contention, such a statement might be admissible in rebuttal.—State v. have known the fact stated [74] If the context shows that the statement, in form a statement of fact, is really an opinion of declarant, it must be excluded [75] The true test as to admissibility is whether the statement is the direct result of observation through declarant's senses, or comes from a course of reasoning from collateral facts If the former, it is admissible, if the latter, it is inadmissible [76] Where it is doubtful whether a declaration was the opinion of deceased or the statement of a fact, it should be submitted to the jury under proper instructions [77]

Statements which would be admissible as testimony as against the objection that they were opinions or conclusions, are likewise admissible as dying declarations [78] A statement of a collective fact involving accused's guilt, although general in its nature, is admissible [79] In some cases a statement by deceased that accused poisoned him was regarded as a mere expression of opinion, [80] while in other cases such a statement has been regarded as not a statement of opinion [81]

It has been held that the mere expression of an opinion that accused was not at fault or of a desire that he should not be prosecuted cannot be received in evidence, [82] although, on the other hand, a statement that accused was not at fault has been admitted [83] So, too, a statement of deceased as to the intentional or accidental nature of the act of accused has been held admissible [84]

b. Provocation

Dying declarations tending to show provocation or the want thereof have been held admissible when such utterances relate immediately to the act of killing and are not mere reflections of the inner consciousness or condition of mind of the deceased

Dying declarations, otherwise admissible, are not rendered incompetent by reason of the fact that they contain statements tending to show provocation or the want of provocation when such utterances relate immediately to the act of killing, [85] and are not mere reflections of the inner consciousness or condition of mind of deceased [86] A declaration by the victim of a homicide that the act was without provocation, or words of a like import, although very general, has been held admissible where it is a statement of a collective fact and not a mere conclusion, [87] and a statement that declarant was not doing anything at the time of his mortal injury has been held one of fact, and admissible [88]

Also, statements of deceased that he was shot for nothing,[89] or that he was murdered in cold blood[90] have been held admissible However, statements of deceased that he was shot like a dog,[91] that he was killed in cold blood,[92] that he was shot without any cause,[93] or that he was shot for nothing[94] have been held inadmissible

Positive statements as to the identity of the malefactor are admissible as dying declarations where the deceased was in a position to know the fact stated

Positive statements as to the identity of the malefactor are always admissible in evidence when deceased was in a position to know the fact stated,[95] and the positive declaration of deceased, although he did not know who his assailant was, that it was not accused is admissible,[96] but, where it was manifestly impossible that deceased could have seen his assailant or known certainly who he was, a mere expression of opinion as to who he was is not admissible as a dying declaration[97] Where, however, want of knowledge does not appear either from the statement itself or from other evidence in the case, it must be presumed that declarant stated a fact within his knowledge[98] Under such circumstances it is a question for the jury whether the declarations represent the primary knowledge of deceased or merely his opinion[99] Of course, statements indicating mere suspicion instead of knowledge of the murderer's identity do not render incompetent other statements of his identity as a matter of fact[1]

Where the declaration by its terms, taken in connection with the circumstances, merely expresses declarant's belief as to the identity of the guilty person, it should be excluded[2] If declarant sees his assailant and from appearances which he may describe he draws a conclusion as to his identity, it is admissible,[3] but if his opinion is the result of a course of reasoning from collateral facts it is inadmissible[4] A conviction has been sustained, however, where there was in evidence a dying declaration that accused did the shooting, although declarant probably did not see who shot him, but based his statement on suspicion, the reviewing court disregarding such evidence in passing on the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the conviction[5]

§ 300. —— State of Feeling between Parties

Declarations tending to show the state of feeling that existed between the accused and the deceased prior to the homicidal act are not admissible in evidence for the prosecution

Declarations tending to show the state of feeling that existed between accused and deceased prior to the homicidal act are not admissible in evidence for the prosecution[6] For example, it is not permissible thus to prove that accused had previously threatened violence to deceased[7] or any other former and distinct transaction not relating to the particular facts constituting the subject matter of the charge or the identification of accused, from which the jury might infer malice toward deceased[8] However, it has been held that a declaration showing the state of mind of deceased toward accused at the time of the shooting,[9] or that the shooting was willful and malicious, based on previous quarrels between them,[10] is admissible Where the killing is admitted, and the only defense is insanity, the dying declaration of deceased is admissible when only a general objection is made, although it contains statements as to prior threats[11]

§ 301. —— Vague, Indefinite, or Incomplete Statements

b Incomplete statements

a. Vague and Indefinite Statements

Generally vague and indefinite expressions which do not point distinctly to the res gestæ of the fatal occurrence should not be admitted as dying declarations

Generally vague and indefinite expressions which do not point distinctly to the res gestæ of the fatal occurrence, but require a resort to inference or supposition to establish facts tending to incriminate the accused, should be excluded[12] So also mere expressions or ejaculations not connected with any statement of facts or circumstances connected with the killing are not admissible.[13] However, as evidence tending to identify the person to whom a dying declaration referred is admissible,[14] a dying declaration is not inadmissible because it does not definitely and positively identify the assailant,[15] especially where there is other evidence tending to show that deceased referred to accused[16]

b. Incomplete Statements

Evidence of dying declarations is inadmissible when the witness does not pretend to give either the words or the substance of what deceased said, or all that he said

Dying declarations are inadmissible when the witness does not pretend to give either the words or the substance of what deceased said, or all that he said[17] This rule, however, does not require that deceased should have stated everything which constituted the res gestæ of the fatal occurrence If he stated anything material to the issue, and it appears that he said all he desired to say, his statement should not be excluded on the ground of incompleteness[18] The fact that an interruption took place, after which declarant completed his statement, does not affect its admissibility[19] A dying declaration which was uncompleted because declarant became unconscious before finishing his statement is not thereby rendered inadmissible,[20] the rule excluding fragmentary declarations applying only to a case in which a witness relates a part of the conversation and not to a case where the witness relates the entire dying declaration,[21]

but if it appears that the statement was intended by declarant to be connected with and qualified by other statements which for any cause he was prevented from making, it should be excluded as fragmentary and incomplete [22]

§ 302. —— False or Contradictory Statements

The falsity or inconsistency of dying declarations does not preclude their admission in evidence, but only affects their weight

The fact that dying declarations are untrue[23] or inconsistent with each other[24] does not preclude them, but bears only on their weight as evidence A second statement contradicting a former one should be received as evidence of the facts stated and not limited to the purpose of discrediting the first [25]

§ 303. Declarant's Competency as Witness

a In general
b Evidence as to competency

a. In General

A dying declaration is admissible when, and only when, declarant would have been a competent witness had he lived, and if, by reason of infamy, mental condition, or lack of religious belief, declarant would not have been competent as a witness, his dying declaration will not be received.

A dying declaration is admissible only if declarant would, if living, be a competent witness, and the declaration is not otherwise objectionable,[26] but, where for any reason declarant would not have been competent to testify, had he survived, his dying declaration is not admissible in evidence [27] The determination of the question of whether declarant would have been competent as a witness had he survived is governed by the general rules relating to the competency of a witness,[28] which are discussed in the C J S title Witnesses §§ 49–314, also 70 C J p 82 note 93 et seq

At common law the dying declarations of a person who is irreligious and does not believe in a state of future reward and punishment are not admissible in evidence,[29] but where this disqualification of a witness has been abolished by statutory or constitutional provisions, his dying declarations are admissible [30] Also, a dying declaration made by a person who would not have been a competent witness because of infamy is inadmissible,[31] unless such disqualification has been removed [32] If declarant at the time of making the declarations was not mentally qualified to be a witness, as, for example, where he is under the influence of drugs or opiates, or is not conscious, his dying declarations cannot be received [33] However, it has been

If deceased, at the time she made the questioned statements, possessed intelligence, consciousness, and memory sufficient to have known what she was saying and doing, and to

held that the objection that declarant was not sound in mind goes to the credibility rather than the admissibility of the declaration [34]

Husband and wife Since either a husband or wife may testify to personal violence received at the hands of the other, as shown in the C J S title Witnesses § 101, also 70 C J. p 162 note 41 et seq, the dying declarations of one are admissible on a trial of the other for the murder of declarant [35]

b. Evidence as to Competency

Although it has been held that it must be shown as a preliminary requisite that declarant was competent as a witness, it has also been held that proof of the competency of declarant as a witness is not required unless there is evidence suggesting that he was not a competent witness

It has been held in some jurisdictions that it must be established as a preliminary requisite that declarant was competent as a witness,[36] and sometimes, by reason of statutory provisions, it must appear that deceased was of sane mind at the time of the making of the dying declaration [37] However, other authorities have held that it is not a preliminary requisite to show that deceased would have been a competent witness had he survived,[38] and that the law will presume that he would have been such, and the burden of establishing the contrary is on the party objecting to the introduction of his statement,[39] but if it appears that the injury sustained by deceased, or the administration of anæsthetics, opiates, or narcotics, or other causes, either separately or combined, were calculated to damage his mental faculties,[40] or if it appears that, in close proximity in point of time to the declaration, declarant was alternately rational and irrational,[41] or that after the fatal injury he was in a semiconscious condition,[42] or in the case of a child of tender years,[43] it is incumbent on the party offering the declaration to show that declarant had sufficient consciousness and intelligence to make a declaration understandingly

While evidence tending to show the mental condition of declarant at the time of making the statement is admissible,[44] direct evidence is not required, it being sufficient if it appears from all the facts and surrounding circumstances [45] In the absence of specific objection, testimony that declarant was in his right mind is sufficient to authorize admission of the declaration [46] Testimony relating to the competency of declarant should tend to show the status at the time of the declaration [47]

dying declarations, the jury should consider the circumstances under which they were made and all the evidence in the case, and give to them the credit and weight to which they believe they are entitled.

Dying declarations do not fall within the rule that hearsay evidence is without probative value,[48] and it has been held that the credibility of dying declarations is to be determined largely by the same rules as are applied in weighing other testimony.[49] Their value depends on their intrinsic probability, and the candor and truthfulness of the person who made them, as well as on the fullness and fairness with which they are reported.[50] In weighing dying declarations, the jury may consider the circumstances under which they were made,[51] as, whether they were due to outside influence[52] or were made in a spirit of revenge,[53] or when declarant was unable or unwilling to state the facts,[54] the inconsistent or contradictory character of the declarations,[55] and the fact that deceased has not appeared and accused has been deprived of the opportunity to cross-examine him,[56] and may give to them the credit and weight to which they believe, under all the circumstances, they are fairly and reasonably entitled.[57]

The rules usually applied to determine credibility of a witness are applicable only to the witnesses who assume to repeat to the jury what declarant is alleged to have said, such rules do not apply in determining declarant's credibility, since he does not appear before the jury and his demeanor while testifying, and his carelessness and fairness while on the witness stand, cannot be observed—State v Gallegos 213 P 1030, 28 N M 403

gard to the circumstances which caused his death, are to be received with the same degree of credit as the testimony of deceased would have been had he survived and been examined on oath,[58] and, where this view obtains, it is not error to instruct the jury to that effect,[59] or to refuse to instruct that a dying declaration is not so satisfactory as the evidence of witnesses on the stand[60] However, a dying declaration has also been regarded as of less value and weight than the testimony of a witness given in open court,[61] and it has been considered error to instruct the jury that dying declarations are entitled to the same credit and force as though the statements had been regularly sworn to before the court and jury,[62] or to refuse to instruct that dying declarations are not entitled to the same credit and force as if deceased were alive and testifying,[63] but, even where such instructions are not authorized, the court, in stating the reasons for the admission of dying declarations, may instruct that, when a man realizes he is in a dying condition, his statement has the same weight as if made under oath[64] In any event, dying declarations are not regarded as on a higher plane than the testimony of an ordinary witness[65] They are admitted only as evidence and are not conclusive,[66] and should be considered with all the other evidence in the case,[67] and the jury may or may not give them the same weight and credit as would be given the testimony of declarant had he survived and testified in court,[68] and on a consideration of all the evidence, the jury may accept or reject them in whole or in part[69]

It has frequently been stated that a dying declaration should be received by the jury with caution and considered with the greatest deliberation in the light of all the evidence in the case,[70] and it has been held that an instruction to this effect is proper[71] and should be given[72]

It is true that dying declarations are to be admitted with great caution, but that is an admonition addressed to the court in ruling on the admissibility of an alleged dying statement, a question with which the jury has no concern. The jury being the sole judges of the weight to be given to the testimony, it is not error to refuse to give an instruction that a dying declaration should be viewed with great caution—State v Le Duc, supra.

Use by prosecution or defense Dying declarations are entitled to the same consideration and credit, whether in favor of the state or of accused [73]

Fact or opinion Whether alleged dying declarations, introduced in evidence, were statements of fact or opinions of the injured party may be considered by the jury in determining their evidential value,[74] and the court may instruct the jury not to give any weight to a mere opinion expressed by declarant [75]

Direct or circumstantial Dying declarations giving the details of a murder and the name of the murderer are direct, and not circumstantial, evidence [76]

§ 305 Impeachment

Dying declarations generally are subject to impeachment in any of the modes by which the testimony of the deceased could have been impeached had he been alive and testifying under oath

Dying declarations generally are subject to impeachment[77] in any of the modes by which the testimony of deceased could have been impeached had he been alive and testifying under oath [78] Also an interpreter,[79] or the witness who testifies as to dying declarations of deceased,[80] may be impeached.

Dying declarations may be overcome by any competent evidence which impairs its value [81] Impeaching evidence must not be irrelevant or too remote in time [82] Thus dying declarations cannot be impeached by proof of statements of deceased made before the killing which were not communicated to accused and did not relate to the subject of the dying declarations,[83] nor can deceased be impeached by what somebody else said and did [84] Evidence as to declarant's motive in making the statement is admissible,[85] and a dying declaration may be impeached by establishing that when it was made declarant was in a reckless, irreverent state of mind and entertained feelings of malice and hostility toward accused [86]

Contradictory or inconsistent statements Dying declarations may be impeached by showing that they are conflicting or contradictory,[87] and it is held con-

petent to prove statements of deceased made at other times after the fatal occurrence in conflict with his dying declarations,[88] although the contradictory statements are not themselves admissible as dying declarations,[89] and notwithstanding a contradictory dying declaration has previously been admitted by way of impeachment.[90] There is, however, authority to the effect that evidence of statements made by deceased when not in extremis, to contradict statements in decedent's dying declaration, is incompetent.[91]

Where the doctrine permitting impeachment by showing inconsistent or contradictory statements prevails, the rule requiring that a foundation be laid by first asking the witness whether he had made contradictory statements at other times has no application.[92]

Character or reputation While it has been held competent to impeach a dying declaration by showing declarant's general bad character,[93] or bad reputation for truth and veracity in the community in which he lives,[94] it has also been held that evidence as to general character is not admissible for the purpose of impeachment.[95]

So also it may be shown that declarant has been convicted of crime, where that is admissible to impeach a witness,[96] as, for example, that he has been convicted of a felony or other crime involving moral turpitude,[97] but the rule that a witness cannot be impeached by evidence of misdemeanors applies to an attempt to impeach dying declarations.[98]

Religious belief It has been held that a dying declaration may be impeached by relevant evidence[99] showing a lack of religious belief of declarant to the extent that he did not believe in future rewards or punishments,[1] and that a dying declaration by one obtuse to religious convictions and disbelieving in a future spiritual existence should not be submitted without an admonition to view it with caution [2] However, it is not to be presumed because deceased was an adherent of a heathen religion that he did not believe in future rewards and punishments,[3] and there is authority for the view that the nature or lack of religious belief does not affect the weight of the declaration [4]

§ 306. Corroboration

When dying declarations have been impeached, it is competent for the prosecution to introduce evidence in corroboration,[5] but statements of deceased other than dying declarations are not admissible for this purpose [6] Where deceased is impeached by proof of his conviction of crime, it is not competent to prove his pardon [7] Where the reputation of deceased has not been directly attacked, evidence of his good reputation is not admissible to bolster his declaration [8]

Abortion Under a statute providing that, in prosecutions for abortion, no conviction can be based alone on a dying declaration unless corroborated as to the fact that an abortion or miscarriage has taken place, such corroboration is necessary to sustain a conviction of manslaughter, based on an unlawful operation with intent to produce an abortion [9]

§ 307. Admissibility in General

The proceedings at a coroner's inquest are generally not admissible in evidence at a trial for homicide

As a general rule the proceedings before the coroner are not admissible in evidence at a trial for murder,[10] at least when the object is merely to corroborate accused's testimony on the trial,[11] but it has been held that the rule excluding such evidence is to guard against unwarranted inferences by the jury, and that on trial by the court the evidence may be received and considered for what it is worth [12] The holding of an inquest may be shown by the testimony of the officer who conducted it [13] Evidence as to whether a particular witness had been subpœnaed to appear at the coroner's inquest is irrelevant and immaterial [14]

§ 308. Testimony and Statements of Accused

Testimony at a coroner's inquest, given by one as an accused or person under arrest, cannot be used against him on a subsequent trial of an indictment growing out of such inquest, unless it was given voluntarily after his being advised of his rights, but testimony given by one simply as a witness and not as a party, generally may be used against him on a subsequent indictment and trial.

The testimony and statements of accused at the coroner's inquest are admissible against him on a subsequent trial of an indictment growing out of the inquest, only where they were voluntary, and not where they were made or given under compulsion,[15] but the admissibility of testimony, amounting to a confession, voluntarily given at the inquest, is not affected by the fact that a confession had been previously procured from accused by duress, while he was in jail.[16] If a person testifies at an inquest as accused or person under arrest, his testimony cannot be used against him on a subsequent trial of an indictment growing out of the inquest, unless it has been voluntarily given after he has been fully advised of all his rights, and has been given an opportunity to avail himself of them,[17] or, although not cautioned, if he was aware of his right to decline to answer.[18] Where a part of accused's statements at the inquest is admitted against him, another part of the same testimony which does not contradict or tend to explain the part admitted may be excluded.[19] On the other hand, if a person testifies at the inquest simply as a witness, and not as a party, he not being under arrest or accused of the crime, his testimony, in the absence of proof to the contrary, will be presumed to be voluntary,[20] and may be used against him under a subsequent indictment and trial for the commission of the crime disclosed by the inquest,[21] even though he was not cautioned as to his rights before giving his testimony,[22] and such testimony will not be rendered inadmissible against him as an involuntary statement because it was made under oath.[23] This rule has been held to apply even though the person so testifying was under suspicion at the time of giving his testimony,[24] but there is authority to the contrary.[25] Under a statute providing that evidence of any statement made by accused as a witness on a legal examination shall not be given against him unless such statement was made when examined as a witness in his own behalf, evidence of accused at the coroner's inquest before he was accused, but at which he did not voluntarily appear but was duly summoned as a witness, was not in his behalf, although such evidence tended to exculpate him.[26] The testimony of accused given at the inquest cannot be received on his behalf at the trial.[27]

Statements by accused to the coroner and jury before being sworn are admissible,[28] although he had not been informed of his legal rights before making them.[29]

29. N.Y.—People v. Strollo, 83 N.E. 573, 191 N.Y. 42.

Person jointly accused. A witness for the defense, who was originally included in the indictment with accused, but as to whom it has been nolled, may be required on cross-examination to state what he said when examined before the coroner, if he was not under arrest at that time,[30] but under some statutes, the testimony before a coroner, of one jointly charged with the crime cannot be used against him on the subsequent trial[31]

§ 309. Testimony of Witnesses

The testimony of witnesses taken at a coroner's inquest, although taken in the presence of defendant, generally is not admissible on the trial for the homicide, unless the witness himself is not available

The testimony of a witness taken at a coroner's inquest, although taken in the presence of defendant, who did not contradict it,[32] is not as a general rule admissible on a trial for homicide,[33] where the witness is present[34] However, under proper circumstances, as where such testimony was taken at the inquest in the presence of accused, with an opportunity to cross-examine,[35] it is admissible where the witness has since died,[36] or has removed from the state,[37] but there are decisions to the effect that the testimony is inadmissible if the witness has removed from the state or cannot be found[38] The fact that the witness is ill is not sufficient to render his testimony before the coroner admissible[39] The court may refuse to compel the coroner to produce the testimony of witnesses at the inquest, which has not closed, but is in progress[40]

When admissible, such testimony may be admitted for the purpose of contradicting the statement of the witness made on the trial of the person accused,[41] but not to prove the existence of any fact deposed to by the witness[42] Opinions of witnesses at the inquest on an ultimate fact to be determined at the homicide trial are not admissible[43] Where evidence given on the inquest has been admitted without objection both sides may use it,[44] but where testimony of accused's witness on cross-examination that he has given certain testimony at the inquest is not denied and the prosecution does not introduce his testimony at the inquest, accused is not entitled to introduce it[45] Where accused's witness has been permitted to show that at the coroner's inquest, whereon his testimony was claimed to differ from that given on the trial, he requested that corrections be made in his deposition, evidence as to the response made to the request by accused's attorney is properly excluded[46]

The verdict of the coroner's jury, or the finding of the coroner, is ordinarily inadmissible on the trial of an indictment for homicide

On an indictment for homicide, as a general rule, the finding of a coroner, or the verdict of a coroner's jury as to the manner and cause of the death of deceased, is not admissible in evidence for any purpose[47] In Louisiana, however, the procès-verbal of the coroner's inquest is admissible in evidence on the trial for homicide to show the death and the cause thereof,[48] although it cannot be used to fix ac-

§ 311. Method of Proof

A coroner's record or minutes of the evidence taken at the inquest may be admitted on the trial, and generally parol evidence of the testimony taken at the inquest is not admissible unless a proper and sufficient record thereof is not available.

A coroner's minutes, or a record of the evidence, the correctness of which is properly proved by other testimony, is admissible on the trial,[50] but where a transcript of the evidence is introduced for the purpose of contradicting certain witnesses, it should contain only the evidence of such witnesses.[51] The coroner, or a member of his jury, may testify as to matters that came under his observation on the inquest,[52] and the coroner may give oral testimony of matters brought out on a preliminary investigation prior to the final inquest,[53] and as to voluntary acts of accused in the course of such investigation,[54] but ordinarily parol evidence of the testimony given is not admissible, when the record can be used.[55] Where, however, the testimony at a coroner's inquest is not reduced to writing,[56] or has become lost,[57] or the proceedings before the coroner are so irregular that the written examination is not admissible in evidence,[58] or the coroner's written report or transcript is not regarded as constituting the best evidence of statements or testimony on the inquest,[59] parol evidence of what was sworn to at such inquest is admissible as being the best evidence procurable, even where the statute requires the testimony at the inquest to be reduced to writing,[60] but the proper foundation for secondary evidence must first be laid.[61] Where a witness at the trial is shown his testimony before the coroner, and admits his signature thereto, and it is then offered and admitted without objection, it is error to refuse to allow it to be read in argument on the ground that it was not sufficiently identified.[62] A physician employed by a coroner to make a post-mortem examination is not rendered incompetent to testify to the result of his own autopsy by the fact that the law requires the coroner to make a record of his inquest.[63] If officially transcribed notes of accused's testimony at the inquest is admitted without objection as an entity, it should be read to the jury as an entity.[64]

Informality in the certificate of death, in that there was no proof of the officer's signature, and the purported procès-verbal did not have the signatures of the members of the coroner's jury, is no ground for its exclusion.[65]
